THE MILITIA.

*VISCOUNT HARDINGE rose to call attention to the present organisation and condition of service in the Militia and the increasing deficiency in the numbers of the force in officers and men; and to ask His Majesty's Government what they propose to do to deal with this evil; and to move for papers.

The noble Viscount said: My Lords, in bringing forward this Motion it is a matter of great satisfaction to know that a question of this kind is never approached in your Lordships' House as one of a purely Party nature. On the contrary, I am fully aware that this subject always receives that consideration which it undoubtedly deserves, noble Lords on both sides of the House being actuated by the same motive—the good of the country, and, therefore, of His Majesty's Imperial Forces. It was, therefore, not surprising, but at the same time none the less gratifying, to find the Secretary of State of War, in his very able speech the other day in the House of Commons when moving the Army Estimates, emphasizing in no small degree the necessity and importance of maintaining a continuity of policy, irrespective of the Party by whom that policy was enunciated. It was also a pleasure, after the many hard things that have been said about the Party now in Opposition, to hear that their administration of the War Office, which had been so freely and adversely criticised in the past, was such that the Secretary of State for War was able to declare in Parliament that—

> "The Army has never been in such an efficient state as it is now."

But although this gratifying announcement has been made with regard to the Army as a whole, we find that a different note is struck when reference is made to a most important branch of the Army. I refer, of course, to that old constitutional force, the Militia, a branch of the Service of which many Lords on both sides have had actual experience, and in which I am sure all of us take a great and abiding interest.

In the speech of the Secretary of State the other day we were told that all was well with the Army, but in the same speech we were informed, with regard to the Militia, that its present condition could not be considered satisfactory, and the reason for this was given in this way, that as yet no definite function had ever been assigned to that force. Without desiring to cavil in any sort of way at the eminently statesman-like and patriotic speech of the Secretary of State for War, I must, as one taking a keen personal interest in the Militia, and having the honour at the present time to command one of His Majesty's Militia battalions, express my great disappointment at learning the cause of the position of the Militia force, and observing that no proposal is made to remedy it. It is for the purpose of obtaining information on this subject that I have brought this Motion before your Lordships to-night, and I trust that my noble friend who represents the War Office in this House will inform us in detail as to what the Government propose to do in order to raise the efficiency of the Militia, and I hope he will tell us at the same time what its future organisation is to be.

I am, I must admit, rather apprehensive as to the future of the Militia. There are at the present moment in this country two schools of thought, in neither of which the Militia occupies a place. On the one hand, there is that school of thought to which many distinguished members of both Houses belong—the blue-water school; on the other hand, there is that school to which as yet no title has been ascribed, but which advocate general disarmament all round. I cannot help feeling that the Militia would die a violent death at the hands of the one, whilst it would suffer a lingering fate at the hands of the other. The first would undoubtedly abolish it as useless, whilst the second would neglect it as unnecessary. Personally, my Lords, I do not belong to either of these schools, nor am I in sympathy with any of their opinions. I claim to belong rather to that school which has for its maxim Si vis pacem, pare bellum. I was glad to note the statement by the Secretary of State that he would like to see the functions of the Militia more clearly defined, and I shall rejoice if the noble Earl the Under-Secretary is able to define clearly those functions to your Lordships to-day.

The present uncertainty as to the future position of the Militia cannot but have a degenerating influence on that force, both as regards morale and efficiency. So long as this force is used as a stepping-stone for the young officer of the Line; so long as the Militia is used in the manner suggested the other day by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, who would like to see the Militia used as a temporary employment for casual labourers out of work—so long as these suggestions are brought forward will the Militia fail to render efficient service to the Crown. This is a state of things which I desire to see altered, for it is undoubtedly the cause of great anxiety on the part of those who have carefully considered the position, a position which up to now has prevented the Militia taking that place in the Services to which by its historical associations it is most undoubtedly entitled. As a Militia commanding-officer I must protest, too, against this branch of the Service being, as the Secretary of State for War very aptly put it in the House of Commons the other day, bled white in order that the Army should be supplied with its fighting strength in time of war. This may or it may not be a useful position to hold; it certainly is not a dignified one, and I suppose in the future it will not be considered a necessary one.

I am perfectly aware that the noble Earl the Under-Secretary has not been many months at the War Office, but he may have been there long enough to discover why the War Office has always looked upon the Militia as the Cinderalla of the Service. Is it not the fact that the Militia has been treated in the past as a half-way house between the Volunteers and the Line? Whilst it has only received half the encouragement accorded to the former, it has always met with double the criticism allotted to the latter. This is not as it should be when it is considered that anything has been thought good enough for the Militia, as regards armament, clothing and equipment, but not as regards the Volunteers. Is it surprising, therefore, that those taking an interest in the Militia should raise criticisms as to the methods of favouritism which have been adopted, I may say, from time immemorial?

I do not propose to trouble your Lordships to-night with figures, for I am asking to be supplied with them by the noble Earl. What I want to know is, what has been the annual decrease of officers and men in the Militia since the South African War. I believe the deficit at the present time is no less than 1,045 officers and 36,000 men. My point is this—if there is a deficiency, as there undoubtedly is, of officers, non-commissioned officers, and men, how do the Government propose to meet this deficiency? If officers are to be regularly deflected from the Militia to the Line, how can it be expected that they should occupy themselves actively for the benefit of those battalions in which they can have no permanent interest? Therefore, it is surely essential that the officers should know their men, and at the same time that the men should know their officers. Without mutual knowledge there can be no mutual sympathy, no esprit de corps, and without esprit de corps the Militia, or any other force, is virtually dead. The Secretary of State for War in his speech on the Army Estimates the other day informed us that there had arisen in the Army a new school of officers, which he described as the thinking school. I desire to enroll myself in that school as a pupil, and I trust that in future the War Office will give fairplay all round. Then I trust that the claims of the Militia, great as they undoubtedly are, will not in the future be neglected as they have been in the past.

We have recently emerged from a great war, in which the Volunteers nobly took their part, and I think the same can be equally said of the Militia. The lessons that were learnt during that war include, we are told, a knowledge of the fighting capabilities of the Volunteers. That is equally true of the Militia. Do not, therefore, let us forget that lesson now that the ship of State is sailing in peaceful waters, but rather let us encourage to the utmost in time of peace those on whom we must rely in time of war. I venture to think that the most difficult problem that the Government have to meet at the present time is the officer question. It cannot be denied that there is now a most lamentable dearth of officers in every branch of His Majesty's Service. More especially does this apply to the Cavalry. Every one must admit that it is essential that these officers should attain the highest standard of efficiency; but what do we find? We find gentlemen admitted into these regiments who have not pased the ordinary elementary educational tests, but who are admitted on probationary terms. This dearth of officers is also to be found in the Militia, and it is due, as I have said, to the suspense and great uncertainty that hangs over their heads. I believe it is chiefly for this reason that the noble and gallant Earl the late Commander-in-Chief has urged the necessity of introducing into this country some form of universal training for all young men on attaining manhood who are of good physique. He has urged that they should be called upon without distinction of class for service in the United Kingdom. This, to my mind, is the true solution of the officer question, and also, for the matter of that, of the rank and file difficulty.

After the lesson of patriotism taught us by our ally Japan, and bearing in mind the fact of that alliance, it behoves us to take immediate steps to fulfil the compact in a far more patriotic spirit than has been the case hitherto, by making up our minds to see that all branches of our Military Service are raised to the highest state of efficiency. And it is on these lines that the noble and gallant Earl has pleaded with no uncertain voice throughout the country. All must admit that the noble and gallant Earl's opinion is entitled to respect and consideration. I trust, therefore, that the people of this country will take what he has said to heart, and that something will be done to make our fighting forces effective for home defence, and at the same time ready to take the field in any part of our Empire, wherever they may be called upon to do so. Admiral Togo, who has been very rightly called the Nelson of the East, has said, and said truly, that battles are won only by preparation in time of peace—preparation, not only of men and materials, but of character. You cannot have character without enthusiasm. That is what I want to see in the Militia, and when it has acquired it, it will be able to take its position as the great custodian of the security of this country.

*THE DUKE OF BEDFORD: My Lords, I join with the noble Viscount in deploring the lack of officers and men in the Militia. The main reason, and the only one with which I propose to deal, for the decline of the Militia is the policy which has been advisedly and consistently pursued towards that force by the War Office. On assuming complete control of the Militia some twenty-five years ago, the War Office determined that the Militia was not to remain as a substantive force, but to become a feeding force for the Line. The foundations upon which alone a national Militia can rest—namely, local influence and civilian interest—were excluded, and replaced by departmental control. This system, advisedly adopted by the War Office, has completely throttled, as it was meant to do, all the national element in the Militia.

The Militia as a national institution has ceased to exist. What we are pleased to call the Militia is now only a recruiting agency for the Line. Even in that capacity there is abundant evidence given before the Norfolk Commission to show that the methods practised for recruiting the Line from the Militia are unsound and unfair, and consequently injurious to the popularity of both Line and Militia in the country.

The policy pursued by the War Office of converting the Militia into a Line-recruiting agency was based on the assumption that the Regular Army was capable, without the assistance of any supplementary force, of bringing to a successful termination any war upon which we were likely to be engaged. We realise now that no matter how excellent our Regular Army may be, it must be numerically so insignificant that it cannot of itself hope to bring to a successful issue a war against a civilised Power. You cannot contend with any hope of ultimate success against a nation in arms by means of a few hundred thousand Regular soldiers. It was to meet this new development in the military systems of the world that His Majesty's late Government created the Home Service Army. But His Majesty's present Government, by a recent Army Order, put an end to the Home Service Army, about which so many debates took place last year. I venture humbly, but sincerely, to congratulate the Government upon their prompt action.

The Home Service Army was the direct negation of the recommendation of the Commission on the South African War, which advised the extension of the forces of the nation outside the limits of the Regular Army. But how are His Majesty's Government going to replace the Home Service Army which has been just ended? The need for a supplementary force to the Regular Army remains the most pressing problem of the day; until it is solved the defence of the Empire is but ill provided for. I trust the Government may find the solution of the problem in the direction of a force raised on a Militia basis, but recruited by national, not by departmental, methods, organised and enlisted for the purpose for which it is required—namely, the defence of the Empire all the world over. I ask the noble Earl the Under-Secretary of State for War whether His Majesty's Government mean to continue the War Office policy of the last twenty-five years, whereby the Militia as a national force has been destroyed and converted into a Line-recruiting agency, or whether they propose to restore the Militia as a substantive, self-contained force, recruited by national and not by departmental methods.

There is a short paragraph dealing with the Militia in the Memorandum of the Secretary of State for War relating to Army Estimates. The proposals contained therein do not touch the main question—that is, the use for which the Militia will in future be required; but they are of considerable interest, and I am very glad to see them. Some experiments are to be made in the direction of increased training for recruits. The recruits of twenty selected battalions are to be drilled under their own officers for six months on enlistment. I have always been in favour of training Militia recruits for six months duing the slack season of the local industry, but I am not in favour of drill on enlistment. Drill on enlistment means in this case—at least as far as I can understand it—that the moment a man enlists he goes into barracks and stays there for six months drill.

Now, suppose recruit No. 1 comes into barracks on the 1st of November, and recruit No. 50 on the 1st of January following, and all the intervening numbers dribble into barracks by ones and twos at various intervals between the 1st of November and the 1st of January; then recruit No. 1 will have been in barracks two months longer than recruit No. 50, and hardly any half-dozen recruits will have been in barracks the same number of days. You will perceive that it is impossible to get these fifty men into one class for instruction. Common-sense shows military training cannot be done by squads of five or six with good results. It is bad for both instructors and instructed.

I should prefer the plan known in the Militia as the preliminary drill party. That would work as follows: say a battalion is to train in May, then all the recruits of that battalion would be assembled in November for a six months recruit training, preliminary to the one month of battalion training. Enlist recruits all the year round, but say to the man enlisted in March—"You do not come up for drill till November, when the preliminary drill assembles." In this way you get all the recruits assembled at the same moment for a course of instruction, followed by one month of battalion training. An Infantry soldier can be taught a great deal in seven months, provided always that the system of instruction is the best, but it never can be the best with drill on enlistment. I know well that drill on enlistment will be a great convenience for the unemployed. But I am looking at this question from the point of view of a Militia commanding officer, anxious to give the soundest military training to men at that moment of their life and at that season of the year when they can be best spared from their civilian work. Drill on enlistment all the year round will increase the number, but will detract from the quality of the Militia. I fear, in short, an inrush of bad characters. I would therefore ask the noble Earl if power could be granted to Militia commanding officers to dismiss from the Service, on their own authority, men of bad character, without the delay inseparable from reference to superior authority.

I ask the noble Earl if the standard of instruction for the six months training of Militia recruits is to be the same as that of the Line, or is it to be a lower standard than that of the Volunteers. I ask for this reason. Signalling has just been abolished in the Militia. A short time ago all Militia adjutants were required to be in possession of a signalling certificate. But that is no longer the case. For the last three years I have been allowed to call up a party of men to be instructed in signalling duties during the recruits' preliminary drill. I have been informed this year that leave cannot be given for calling up this party for instruction, because signalling is prohibited in the Militia.

Signalling is authorised for the Volunteers and Yeomary. It is essential for service in the field; but since it is not to be allowed in the Militia, the inference must be that it is not the intention to employ the Militia in the field in the same way as the Volunteers and Yeomanry. The abolition of signalling for the Militia is quite consistent with the policy of using the Militia as a Line-recruiting agency. It is consistent with the absorption of the Militia into a Home Service Army, but it is not consistent with greatly increased training for the Militia. and for using the Militia as units in the field. I would ask the Under-Secretary of State for War if, pending the advent of a little clearness of thought upon these matters, Militia battalions should be allowed to practise signalling, and to call up men for signalling instruction if their application to do so be recommended by the General commanding the division.

As regards remedies for the deplorable and ever-increasing deficiency of officers in the Militia, I have already suggested to your Lordships that lords-lieutenant and deputy-lieutenants should be made responsible for providing officers for the Militia. There are at present 123 lords-lieutenant and about 3,700 deputy-lieutenants in Great Britain and Ireland, all appointed under the Militia laws, all persons of light, leading, and influence in their localities, and charged by Statute with duties towards the Militia which, by the policy of the War Office, they are prevented from performing. As regards the deficiency of men, I have on a previous occasion suggested that that deficiency should be met by means of national instead of departmental recruiting. On those two points I have nothing to add to that which I have already said in your Lordships' House. There is, therefore, no need for me to dwell further upon these two subjects.

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Earl of PORTSMOUTH): My Lords, my noble friend Lord Hardinge has brought forward this Motion with so much fairness and such complete absence of Party feeling that it is my intention to discuss this matter in the same spirit. My noble friend moves for Papers. On seeing his Motion on the Paper I wrote asking what the Papers were that he required, and he replied—

> "The Papers referred to in my Question are as to the present deficiency of officers, non-commissioned officers, and men in the Militia; also as to whether this decrease has been gradual during the last five years."

I can assure my noble friend that I shall be very glad to have those figures got out and submitted to him. I would beg him, however, to bear in mind that any figures that we can produce giving effect to his wish must be modified, and that they cover the very disturbing influence of the war itself.

I now propose to deal with the general question of the Militia, which has been raised by the noble Viscount. I am glad that noble Lords have raised in this House a debate upon the Militia, if it is only to have the opportunity of re-assuring your Lordships that it is the desire of His Majesty's Government to utilise to the fullest extent that we can the opportunities and energies of the Militia. The Secretary of State in his recent speech alluded to the necessity for a power of expansion outside the limit of the Regular forces of the Crown, and in so doing he was re-affirming a principle which finds a vital place in the recommendations both of the Elgin and Norfolk Commissions.

It is my intention, appreciating to the full the friendly spirit in which this matter has been approached, to take the House into our confidence. We admit, and in the admission deplore the fact, that the Militia is at present in a very unsatisfactory state. One reason for this is, to my mind, the decline of county military feeling in the United Kingdom. Another is the popularity of the Yeomanry. They receive high pay and allowances—5s. 6d. a day as compared with 1s. paid to the militiamen; and a yeoman also gets £5 for his horse for the fortnight, and as the horse is often his own, this means a free gift in many cases. There is no doubt that the Yeomanry absorb more officers and men into their ranks than formerly, and also attract more popular attention and sympathy. The Volunteers, too, possess considerable political influence. They have of late years attracted many men of the Militia class into their ranks, owing to their being able to pay them whilst in camp, and consequently they also have been greater competitors with the Militia force than was formerly the case.

A militiaman is paid and clothed and fed exactly on similar lines to a Regular. The Volunteers are not paid a daily rate of pay, but the corps are paid a capitation grant per efficient to meet expenses, such as drill-halls and clothing, and camp allowance, to meet the expenses of camp, rations, etc. On the whole there is not much fault to find with the principle of the present organisation of the Militia. It is essentially a county organisation, and, where county feeling exists, it is the one best calculated to attract civilians who can give up a month annually to soldiering. The varying establishments of regiments—they vary from 600 to over 1,200 men in a regiment—are, however, detrimental to efficiency from a mobilisation point of view. In the Regular Army the regiment is of the same establisment, and mobilisation is planned accordingly—transport and everything required for fitting it for the field. It is hoped that this may be remedied when we know what effect the new system of training will have on the force, thereby enabling us at the War Office to rearrange the establishments of battalions.

Some Militia officers object, and perhaps with reason, to an organisation which places them under the control of the Regulars; for example, the Militia recruits and the permanent staff are during the non-training season under the officer commanding the Line depot, and not under the officer commanding the Militia unit. This is a matter the importance of which the War Office is fully alive to and is seriously considering. The future organisation of the Militia is not yet determined on. It plays such an important part in sharing the duties and responsibilities of the Regular Army that it can only be considered in conjunction with it, and we cannot announce our intentions with respect to the Militia until we are in a position to formulate our policy on the Army generally. The new condition of service, which we propose to try experimentally with twenty infantry battalions, is that recruits will on enlistment, in any period of the year, drill for six months instead of, as at present, for sixty-three days, and the regiment will train annually for forty-one days instead of for twenty-seven. The noble Duke spoke of the difficulties that might arise from the men being engaged at different times. I quite admit the force of that; but we cannot control the conditions of labour. I should like to say that this has nothing to do with the idea of winter training. It is simply an extension of the present periods of training by which it is hoped that recruits will get a more thorough grounding in a soldier's duties, and the trained militiamen will have more time for the many subjects of instruction which now have to be compressed into twenty-seven days—indeed, into much less than that, when Sundays and bad weather are taken into account.

In musketry we anticipate a great improvement by the increased time given to drill and to training. Under existing arrangements the musketry instruction is of necessity much neglected and hurried through. The annual training of units will continue to take place generally during the summer season, as at present. The question of winter training is receiving careful consideration. It will be tested with a limited number of regiments, should they be anxious to undergo it, and should accommodation be available. The difficulties in the way of winter training are that the instruction in outdoor work, especially musketry, cannot, owing to cold weather and bad light, be so beneficial as in the summer; that accommodation is difficult to find; empty barracks are rare; canvas cannot be used. To billeting there are grave social as well as military objections; it is not popular with the officers or with a considerable proportion of the men. With regard to the supply of officers, inquiries are being made of various Universities and educational establishments to ascertain whether a large number cannot be obtained from those sources. The War Office also hope to get increased interest and assistance from lords-lieutenant and deputy-lieutenants of counties.

LORD NEWTON: In what way?

*THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH: We hope, as I say, to get increased interest and assistance from lords-lieutenant and deputy-lieutenants of counties, whose very appointments, as was mentioned by the noble Duke, were made under the Militia Act, 1882 (Sections 29, 30), and who, under Section 6 of the Act, are primarily responsible for the supply of officers for the Militia. The existence of this inherent obligation has in the large majority of cases been entirely ignored of late years, and we are certainly not supported as we should be by these officers. At present the deputy-lieutenants, both in their numbers—they run to thousands—and in their military efficiency, bear too close an analogy to the military patriots in America, who were by no means the least expensive legacy of the Civil War.

The deficiency in the numbers of officers and men in the Militia is much to be regretted. It is not being lost sight of by the War Office. We earnestly hope that if we can place the Militia on a sound basis, and clearly define its military functions, a matter which necessarily involves time and great care, it will recover its old prestige and its position among the military forces of the Crown. With regard to signalling in the Militia, it was found that, owing to the concentration of training into one month in the year, it was impossible to keep up the requisite standard, which was only to be acquired by continual practice, and, consequently, the issue of signalling equipment is not now allowed, nor are Regular officers required to hold signalling certificates on appointments as adjutants, although a certificate of proficiency in semaphore work is essential.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE: Why is it allowed to the Volunteers and the Yeomanry and not to the Militia?

*THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH: I am not able to answer that Question offhand; but it must be remembered that the Volunteers have an advantage which the Militia have not, in that they are able to practise signalling more or less regularly. This question of signalling is undoubtedly an important one. It is one which shall not be lost sight of by the War Office; but we feel that our decision must be guided by the experience of the increased training. We are anxious that the Militia, in order to be a real support to the Regular Army, should have every opportunity of training as self-contained units with its own officers. As the Secretary of State has said in another place—

> "By all means let the Militia be the support of the Regular Army, but let them train in their own units and under their own officers."

It is not intended to stop the transfer of trained militiamen to the Regular Army, but it is proposed, in the case of the twenty experimental battalions, to restrict that transfer to those militiamen who have completed at least one annual training—that is of six weeks—in addition to their recruits' drill of six months. These commanding officers of Militia will thus be enabled to see, for at any rate one training, all men who have enlisted in their unit, instead of, as at present, having the trouble and anxiety of a large proportion of their recruits merely enlisting in the Militia as a stepping-stone to the Line. In conclusion, I desire to say that, without being in a position at present to give more detailed information, we are desirous to give to the Militia the character of a national force, and we are anxious that the Militia should, both by their organisation and training, be at all times prepared to take the field as units.

*LORD RAGLAN: My Lords, although the noble Earl the Under-Secretary of State for War expressed himself kindly towards the Militia, he was not in a position to make any statement as to what is to be our future position. The position of the Militia for several years has been an extremely unfortunate one. We were first of all told that we were to be very much improved. The late Secretary of State for War when he came into office admitted, in a speech either at Manchester or at Liverpool, that the force had been very much neglected, and he stated that he intended to do great things for it. We heard nothing more until the following year, when the right hon. Gentleman proposed to do a great thing for the Militia by abolishing it. That plan was not adopted; but since then no further word has come, either from the late Secretary of State for War, or from the present Secretary of State, as to what is to be our future.

The effect of the present uncertainty, as every one of your Lordships is well aware, has been most unfortunate to the Militia, and it has been excessively unfortunate in the case of officers. The question of an armed force of any sort is primarily one of officers. The rank and file can be improvised in a short space of time; non-commissioned officers even, within limits, can be provided; but it is absolutely impossible to provide a body of competent officers without long and careful training. The noble Viscount quoted figures to show that the Militia is 1,045 under strength in regard to officers. That practically means that there are something like 30 per cent of vacancies among the officers' ranks. That is a most dangerous state of things for the country; and what makes that particular matter more than usually serious is this, that, as the noble Duke has said, there are great differences in the establishments of regiments. Some are very strong, while others are very weak. I think the noble Earl was too sanguine in putting 600 as his lowest estimate. I am acquainted with a regiment which does not possess, I think, 200; and it is a curious fact that those regiments which have most officers usually have the fewest men, and vice versa. The strongest regiments are in the manufacturing districts of the north. If the noble Earl will turn his attention to the Lancashire regiments, he will find that there are fifteen, sixteen, seventeen, eighteen, and nineteen vacancies for officers in those battalions, and a battalion with only one-third of its establishment of officers cannot under any circumstances be considered an efficient unit.

The deficiency of men is also very great. Of course all these things are known at the War Office, and the War Office ought to set to work and correct these deficiencies. I remember some years ago discussing the question with a very distinguished officer, holding a very high position in the Army, and his final words were—

"You have never had Militia officers and you can never get them, and there is an end of it."

I do not think that is the way the thing should be looked at by an officer holding a high position, but I am afraid that is the view that has been taken hitherto by distinguished officers at the War Office. The difficulties of the Militia lie in the fact that the differences between the various regiments is so great that it is impossible to lay down any general rule. You had in former days a very large number of country gentlemen who officered your Militia regiments. As I have said before in your Lordships' House, those gentlemen have disappeared. You have not got that large number of comparatively idle young men who existed in this country twenty years ago, and therefore you cannot rely upon getting your soldiering done for you in the Militia by a certain idle class in their spare time.

If you wish to have officers for the Militia, there are only two ways of obtaining them—you must either pay them or force them. If you have compulsory service in some form—which, I hold, must come as sure as there is a sun in heaven—the whole of your difficulties will disappear. There are many ways of paying besides the physical act of putting money into a man's hand. You can offer certain privileges to those who give up their time to the service of their country. You can confine distinctions such as deputy-lieutenantships to those officers who have served in the Militia. There are, again, many appointments of a semi-military description throughout the Empire which you could confine to officers of the Militia. Why should not the Indian police be reserved exclusively for officers of Militia? It would cost the country nothing, and it would cost India nothing; and India would have this advantage, that she would recruit officers for her police who had a certain amount of military knowledge and discipline. There are other ways in which officers could be encouraged to serve in the Militia. I think a Militia officer should be exempt from serving as high sheriff, which is a very severe tax now laid on country gentlemen. Personally, I should like to see the whole of the officers of the Army come into the Army through the Militia. I think you would then get a certain amount of work done for the country by these young men who are now engaged at "crammers," doing no good to their country and probably very little good to anybody but the "crammers" who receive their fees; and those who did not get into the Army subsequently would, many of them, remain in the Militia.

These are a few of the suggestions I throw out, but what I urge most strongly on His Majesty's Government is that they should really take up this question and make up their minds to do something. A force which has lost one-third of its officers and which for many years has had a considerable deficiency in its establishment, is a force which cannot be said to be in a healthy condition. It is, indeed, perilously approaching extinction as a military force. With regard to the question of men, there are ways in which recruiting could be largely improved. You never will get the Militia put on a satisfactory basis until you make one man responsible for a unit. At this moment there are three or four people responsible. There is the commanding officer, who commands the battalion during the training; there is the officer commanding at the depot, who is the commanding officer out of the training; there is the recruiting officer, who may or may not be at the depot, and there is the adjutant. You have these four officers, either of whom could claim all the credit if the regiment was in a satisfactory state, and all of whom could disclaim responsibility if it was not. Until you make the commanding officer responsible for the regiment you can never get it in a satisfactory condition.

I should like to endorse the hope expressed by the noble Duke, that commanding officers will be given power to discharge bad characters. I could quote to your Lordships many instances of the immense amount of trouble, inconvenience, and cost to the country which the retention of one bad man in the regiment has caused. I regret the noble Earl did not allude to one incident which I think the whole Militia force deeply regrets—the abolition of the Militia Advisory Board. That board was instituted some years ago at the War Office. It consisted of six commanding officers of Militia, nominated by the generals of different districts, and at certain periods they met, and, accompanied by high officials of the War Office, discussed Militia questions. The late Secretary of State for War swept away that board. I venture to think that was one of the most unfortunate things that has ever been done. As long as the Advisory Board was in existence the Militia felt that at all events they had a channel through which expression could be given to their needs. That board has been swept away, and there is now practically no channel through which we can communicate with the high authorities at the War Office. I hope the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War will see his way to reinstate the Militia Advisory Board. It was not an extravagant board; the whole of the expenses in connection with it could not have come to more than £25 a year. It gave great confidence to the Militia to feel that they had representatives of their own who were consulted from time to time by the War Office.

In conclusion, I would again most earnestly press on His Majesty's Government the importance of proceeding with the Bill which His Majesty's late Government passed through your Lordships' House, under which the Militia were liable, in the event of a great national emergency, to serve abroad. It would be impossible to conceive a more unsatisfactory condition of things than that which now obtains. The moment war breaks out the militiaman is asked to volunteer for service abroad. I have always looked upon that as a great mistake. It is really fraudulent. It is like the action of our grandfathers, who, while they pretended to keep up the Army and Navy by voluntary enlistment, kept up both by compulsion. You put officers especially in a most unfortunate and unfair position, especially officers who are married men with families. It is the unanimous opinion of the Militia that if the whole force were liable to serve abroad in a case of great national emergency it would raise the status of the Militia and make the force feel that at last it had got a settled position among the forces of the Crown.

*Lord HAVERSHAM: My Lords, I rise with unfeigned diffidence to address your Lordships' House for the first time. My only excuse for taking part in this debate is my former connection, for some years, with the War Department, and the fact that for the last five years I have had very unwillingly to take a leading part on the Front Opposition Bench in discussions of this character in another place. I venture to think that there could hardly be any subject more important than that which the noble Viscount has brought forward this evening, because I think if there was one matter upon which the people of this country gave their decided opinion in the recent election, it was that some steps must be taken to reduce, if possible, the enormous sum of £29,750,000, which we now spend on the Army of this country. But, as the Secretary of State has impressed upon us, the only possible way of reducing, to any large extent, the cost of the Army, is by reducing the number of men; and if you do that you must look to the second line, and be sure that the men you have behind can take their place, and are capable of expansion when time of emergency arises.

I do not believe there is any assembly in this country which is so capable of discussing particular subjects in connection with the Army as your Lordships' House. I have listened with the greatest instruction and pleasure to those debates which have been initiated by the noble Duke who spoke second to-night, and by many other noble Lords, and I think it must be from the fact that there are so many noble Lords who have themselves taken a part in the commanding and organising of the Auxiliary

Forces, that we always have an illuminating light shed on all these subjects. It was not possible for the Secretary of State in his exhaustive speech to deal in detail with all the particular elements of the question, and, therefore, I think that in dealing with this question of the Militia your Lordships' House is well occupied, and the results of the discussion will, I am sure, be conveyed by my noble friend below me to the Secretary of State, and will be well weighed by him and the Army Council.

There is one matter which, I think, makes this debate particularly opportune at this moment. We have to acknowledge that the Militia has lately gone through a period of extreme peril. It was not so very long ago that we had a direct statement from the then Secretary of State for War that he intended to abolish the Militia altogether, and to divide the armed forces of the country into two bodies, one of which should be composed of men of long service who should serve abroad, and the other, of men enlisted for only two years service, who never were to leave these shores, and who were to constitute what he called a territorial Army. Of all the proposals I think the worst was the amalgamating of the Militia, and the causing of it to lose its local status by making it part of the territorial Army. In the summary of his speech which he issued with the Army Estimates the then Secretary of State for War said that when economy was so earnestly and universally demanded, and when it was conceded that economy could only be obtained by reducing the men maintained, they must begin with the least efficient. Why, he asked, should not the Militia be entirely absorbed in the territorial Army? He added—

> "There will be an improvement in the Militia if public opinion will allow the amalgamation of the Militia with the Line, for the purpose of forming a true territorial Army."

I venture to think that that was a method of improving the Militia by wiping it off the face of the earth, and if we lose the Militia we should be denuding our military forces of one of their best arms.

I do not share the gloomy views of the Militia which some noble Lords entertain. Although I deeply deplore that there has been a decrease of 6,000 men in the recruits, after all what is the falling off in the strength of the Militia? Why, 600 men only. It was 86,491, it is now 85,814. Independently of that, which is a mere trifling reduction, there are certain features, if you look at the recruiting returns, which give a silver lining to the cloud, and make us think that matters are not altogether so bad as they seem. In the first place, there is an increase this year of 1,000 in the re-engaged men, and there is a decrease of 1,600 in the number we have lost by desertion. If the desertions have decreased by 1,600 and the re-engagements have increased by 1,000, surely that shows that the Militia is not so discontented as we are led to believe. In regard to the falling off in the number of recruits you must take into consideration the fact that in November, 1904, the standard of recruits was raised, and you have in addition to that a stricter examination for the men. You have both a closer physical examination and an examination into their antecedent character, and it is to that examination that the authorities say we mainly owe the falling off in the number of recruits. They say that while the recruits themselves are certainly not quite equal in physique to the Line, yet at the same time they rapidly improve by the better diet and the better conditions under which they live. I am sure all must rejoice to find that their character has been exceedingly satisfactory, and that that improvement is mainly due to the stricter examination made into their antecedent character.

I should like to say one or two words as to how we can popularise the Militia force. I think one of the wisest proposals of the Norfolk Commission was that for the future the Militia should be exercised, or, at any rate, that two trainings out of three should take place, in the neighbourhood of their county town. It is only human that the men and officers should like to show themselves in uniform among their own friends. They like to be seen at drill and at recreation, and so far as the officers are concerned there is a unanimous opinion, I believe, that many would be retained if they could give an afternoon or so a week to their own business. I think it would be an excellent thing if the plan could be adopted by the War Office of two out of three trainings being held in the neighbourhood of the county town. Then it may be said, "But they must have brigade drill." I never could see why you could not brigade Militia regiments of contiguous counties. Take the case of the Berkshire Militia, the Oxfordshire Militia, and the Buckinghamshire Militia, which are all in contiguous counties. It so happens that in the neighbourhood of each county town there are excellent opportunities for drill. It may be said that if you drill Militia regiments together they will only strive to become equal to the best Militia regiment, and will not see their own faults. But what could possibly be easier than to bring down from Aldershot by train, and station, say, at Reading, two battalions of the Regular troops under an excellent and experienced brigadier. There you would have a force of five battalions which would enable brigade drill to be carried out effectively. Recollect that the alternative is to take the Militia for their whole training to Salisbury Plain, or Aldershot. Sir William Butler says on that subject—

> "I do not see the necessity of assembling men who are only half trained and who can only be half trained, in large masses in isolated and desolate places like Salisbury Plain. You kill recruiting by it."

That is what we have to look to. If such training is of use to the brigadiers, and possibly to those commanding battalions, it is not of the slightest use to the private in the ranks, who goes home having seen nothing, having understood nothing, and having wasted precious time.

The real way to increase the number of the men is by entering into some sort of arrangement with the large employers of labour. That is done with singular success in the case of the Northumberland Militia. That Militia—a letter from whose adjutant I hold in my hand—has entered into an arrangement with the directors of the Elswick Works, and these men take their holidays by going out for twenty-seven days with the Militia. The adjutant says—

> "Large employers of labour in Northumberland encourage their men to become Militiamen for the following reason:—The Northumbrian is a hard worker. He gets stale. He goes for twenty-seven days Militia training in the free pure air. He is fed well and regularly, and goes back to work like a giant refreshed. Consequently the works reap the benefit; hence we find very little difficulty in recruiting."

Lord Haversham.

*LORD RAGLAN: Is that artillery or infantry?

*LORD HAVERSHAM: Infantry. What proves such a success in the case of the Northumbrian, might surely be carried out in the south. Why should not the Berkshire Militia enter into communication with Messrs. Huntley and Palmer and the proprietors of other large works? Surely this would be equally easy in the neighbourhoods of Manchester and Liverpool; it only requires a little organisation. The arrangement in Northumberland is popular both with the Elswick Works and the Militia authorities.

I cannot agree with the noble Lord who spoke last and who expressed the hope that His Majesty's Government would reintroduce the Bill for making the Militia liable, on embodiment, to serve abroad. I confess that I once thought that that would be a good thing. I thought it would add to the status of the Militia on the one hand, and give the authorities a certainty of having a certain number of men to send abroad on the other. But I understand that it is regarded with the greatest possible jealousy and dislike by some of the best regiments in the country. I know one case—and this is a case of a regiment whose complement of officers is full and which has 900 men in the ranks—where the officers signed a roundrobin to the effect that they would resign their commissions if that Bill passed

LORD SALTOUN: Will the noble Lord give the name of that regiment?

*LORD HAVERSHAM: I would prefer not to do so; it would be rather invidious.

*LORD RAGLAN: I think I could name it.

*LORD HAVERSHAM: But even if the Bill were passed it would be of no great advantage, because you get the men already. The men are sure to volunteer for service abroad in the case of grave national emergency. One word with regard to the officers. I endorse most fully what has fallen from noble Lords opposite with regard to the position of the commanding officer. You would never initiate such a system as we have now. You have a man responsible to the Crown for a large number of men, and you do not give him power of appointment, transfer, or promotion, of any non-commissioned officers on the permanent staff. The whole thing is most ridiculous. By the Militia regulations I do not believe the commanding officer is able to see his own recruits except once a year, and then by suffrance. The Norfolk Commission said on that point that the opinion of commanding officers should be as far as possible considered in reference to appointments, transfers, promotions, etc. Sir Alfred Turner declared that the commanding officer goes out of existence so far as his battalion is concerned after training. That is, I think, a very bad system. The Duke of Connaught declared that the Militia commanding officer ought always to command and to have supervision of the regiment during the whole time he is commanding.

I suppose that next to the commanding officer we ought to consider the adjutant as the most important officer, particularly in a Militia regiment. I hope that the greatest possible care will be taken in the selection of these officers and that they will be regarded as responsible as adjutants in the Line. If a battalion is brought up to a high pitch of perfection and the adjutant does his duty satisfactorily he should be rewarded by a staff appointment. With regard to the proposal to interest lords-lieutenants and deputy-lieutenants more in this matter. I was glad the Secretary of State declared that he did not see why we should not make it a condition of the appointment of lords-lieutenant that they should be persons taking an interest in the organisation of the Militia. I can remember the time when the Leicestershire and the Nottingham Militia were 1,000 strong. The reason for the popularity of those regiments was that the Duke of Rutland of that day, who was honorary colonel, took the greatest interest in them, always attending the reviews and inspections. The Northumberland Militia is in a very good state, both as regards officers and men, and the reason for that is attributed to the fact that the battalions are respected, and have been raised to their present pitch owing to the interest taken in the force by the Duke of Northumberland and his family, and by the county gentlemen of Northumberland. If this spirit could be instilled into county gentlemen in other parts of the country, and the forces respected, instead of being looked down upon, the officer question would be solved. If county gentlemen could be induced to take up commissions the old constitutional force would, I think, once again take its place as the premier auxiliary force of the country—a position worthy of its ancient memories, and worthy of its former fame.

LORD NEWTON: My Lords, I have listened to a number of military debates in this House, but I have never listened to one which left a more hopeless impression on my mind. Almost every speaker up to now has made some suggestion or other with reference to the improvement of the force, or the increasing of its popularity. To my mind, it is not a question of improving the Militia at all. The question is, is it possible to keep the Militia itself in existence at all? As far as I am able to gather, not only from what I have heard this afternoon but from other sources, the Militia is actually perishing before our eyes, in spite of the fact that, according to the present Secretary of State for War, we are now spending upon the Militia £21 19s. 3d. per head, whereas ten years ago the cost of the Militia was only £13 10s. per head. I do not know what moral this conveys to the rest of the House, but to me it conveys the impression that it would be quite impossible to find any more decisive condemnation of what you are pleased to call the voluntary system. I presume there are people—possibly a majority of those assembled here—who still believe in the efficacy of that exploded system, but I have never heard any more convincing proof of the absolute failure of the so-called voluntary system than what has come out to-day.

We have been told by various speakers that the Militia are so many thousand men short, but this does not come upon us in the light of a revelation. It was all brought before us in the Report of the Norfolk Commission—the only Report, by the way, which we have had for many years past of any real value to us with regard to military affairs. In the Report of that Commission the position is put in a nutshell. The Commission state—

> "Under the present system there would seem to be an incessant effort to exact from the Militia and the Volunteers, in the name of the State, more than the State will pay for and more than it has any right to demand."

The Commission went on to point out that every Power has abandoned the idea that war is the exclusive business of a limited class, and has subjected its male population to a thorough military training. What further explanation do you want than that? In other words, we are continually endeavouring to do what every other nation has long ago given up.

We have heard a variety of recommendations and suggestions this afternoon. I do not know whether my noble friend who initiated this discussion was satisfied with the reply that he received from the Under-Secretary of State for War, but I must confess that personally, if I had been in his place, I should have derived no satisfaction from it whatever, because it appeared to me to amount to a mere pious expression of opinion that the Government were well aware of the inestimable services of the Militia, and that if they were given time, and if the present Secretary of State for War in particular was given time, eventually things would be brought round to a thoroughly satisfactory condition. I seem to have heard expressions of this kind frequently before. Since I have had anything to do with politics I have seen six Secretaries of State for War, beginning with Mr. Edward Stanhope and ending with the present occupant of that office, and, strange though it may appear, I have never been able to see any real distinction between the eminent persons who have occupied that position, though much of their time has been taken up in pointing out the shortcomings of their predecessors. There may be differences, but they are not perceptible to my mind. The results are in every case precisely the same.

I may add that I have always observed exactly the same phenomena with regard to Secretaries of State for War. When a Government is formed and a person appointed Secretary of State for War, universal approval is expressed on all sides as to the choice of this gentleman, who is pointed out as the one man absolutely fitted to put everything right. In course of time this paragon makes a speech and after he has done so the applause becomes still more vociferous. Everyone declares that he has shown, as everybody expected, that he was the man absolutely suited to the post. At a subsequent period this statesman produces what is generally known as a scheme, and then, if possible, the feeling of admiration which is felt for him increases, and although people, as a rule, do not understand the scheme very clearly, yet they all say the same thing. "Here," they say, "is a statesman who has at last grasped the rudiments of the case, a man who does understand the necessities of the Empire." This paragon, as I say, produces his scheme, and then there is silence. After about six months have elapsed it suddenly appears to strike people that our military system is in very much the same position at it was before, and when a year has elapsed this paragon has probably become the most unpopular member of the Ministry, and the question really is as to who shall throw the biggest brickbat at his head when the first opportunity occurs. As the present Secretary of State is a gentleman of a philosophic turn of mind, he has no doubt anticipated that in the course of a year or two the cloud of unpopularity will descend on his head. I repeat that I have never been able to see any difference between these distinguished men, because they have all been engaged during their tenure of office in what I might term shuffling and re-shuffling the military pack in the hope of discovering five aces instead of only four.

There is not much consolation to be derived from the suggestions that have been made or from the statement of the Under-Secretary. I turn to the suggestions that have been made by my noble friend behind me, the Duke of Bedford. The noble Duke is well known as a highly efficient officer who has taken the greatest interest in the Militia, but I entirely fail to realise the value of the suggestions he has made. There appears to be in this House a touching confidence in the power of lords-lieutenant, and it was a great satisfaction to me to find that this feeling was entertained by democratics opposite like Lord Haversham. He evidently entertained a sub lime confidence in the power of lords-lieutenant, with regard to which I am not so absolutely sure myself. After all, what can they do? What means have they for forcing either men or officers to enter the Militia? There is only one means that occurs to me by which they could exercise their power, and that would be by some means of social pressure. My noble friend, in his capacity as Lord-Lieutenant, might give a vast garden-party and induce every other lord-lieutenant in the country to do the same, for the express purpose of leaving out those gentleman who decline to join the Militia force.

Then my noble friend has another suggestion. If the Militia force cannot be created by the action of lords-lieutenant, let it be created by the action of deputy-lieutenants. I think I am not wrong in attributing to my noble friend the scheme by which every deputy-lieutenant would be liable for one-third of a Militia officer, and I think he intimated that in his opinion every deputy-lieutenant who failed in conjunction with his two colleagues to produce a Militia officer should be deprived of his commission. I confess I do not see how that could work. I, for instance, am a deputy-lieutenant. Suppose there is a shortage of Militia officers in my district. I presume I must call a meeting, collect everybody I can from the district, and address them in as pathetic terms as I can, saying: "Here am I, a Deputy-Lieutenant. Now, for God's sake, some of you go and join the Militia or I shall lose my commission." What effect does my noble friend think they would have on my hearers? The impression upon them would be very much the same as that which was created on the mind of the Irish landlord when he was told that his agent would be shot. They would tell me probably, in more or less polite language, that it was matter a of supreme indifference to them whether I was a deputy-lieutenant or not; and I think they would be perfectly justified. There have been other remedies suggested. The noble Duke who spoke second in the debate this evening suggested that if a sufficient number of men were not found by a locality, that locality should be fined. I imagine that more than half the districts of the country would have to be fined, and all those districts would necessarily be represented by Members in Parliament, and I should not envy a Government the task of keeping a majority in the House of Commons if a large number of its supporters represented what may be called defaulting districts. These remedies appear to me to be absolutely useless. I do not wish to labour the question of compulsion, but I do hope, before this session is concluded that we may fight this question out and that the noble and gallant Earl, Lord Roberts, who I regret is not in his place to-day, will bring forward a Motion asserting the absolute necessity of introducing some system of universal training. I should like to see the opinion of this House taken upon it.

In the meanwhile, I would point out that if you really want to put the Militia on a sound footing, and if you really mean to have that reserve Army which you all profess to desire, there is only one way of having it, and that is by adopting the conclusions of the Norfolk Commission. A force such as I have mentioned, capable of meeting European troops, not outside this country, but in this country, can only be raised on one principle—namely, that of universal liability to training, and my personal opinion is that remedies such as have been suggested this afternoon are little better than a mere beating of the air, and that we shall not make any satisfactory progress until some form of compulsory service is adopted in this country.

Lord BURGHCLERE: My Lords, the House always listens to my noble friend opposite with pleasure and amusement, and I am certain that we have followed his remarks in that spirit this evening. My noble friend made some attack on the present Secretary of State. He said he thought that Mr. Haldane would eventually prove as destitute of popularity as those Secretaries of State who have preceded him in that high office. I venture to think that there is a great difference between the policy of the present Secretary of State and that of his predecessors. If my noble friend will carry his recollection back not so long ago he will remember that Secretary of State after Secretary of State came down to this House with a fully-fledged scheme of reform in his pocket very shortly after having entered upon office. I remember Secretaries of State and Under-Secretaries of State who seemed to count their chickens before they were hatched, and in many cases counted chickens which were never hatched at all. But if I may say so of the present Secretary of State without disrespect, he does not try to number chickens which may be hatched in the future; his attitude is rather that of a brooding hen, and I have no doubt that in time we shall reap the reward of that patience which he asks the country to exercise pending the result of his deliberations.

I cannot help remembering other debates which have taken place in this House on the question of the Militia. I well remember one in 1904, when we discussed one of those fully-fledged schemes to which I alluded just now, and which was brought before the country by the then Secretary of State, Mr. Arnold-Forster. The pivot of that scheme was the question we are debating this afternoon. Mr. Arnold-Forster at that time proposed to absorb thirty-three battalions of the Militia into the territorial Army which he was then going to create, and he also proposed to abolish the remaining battalions of Militia. That was to effect a saving of £1,800,000, the cost at that time of the Militia. We were told then, as we are told now, that the condition of the Militia was unsatisfactory. I remember that Lord Selborne in that debate declared that the Militia was profoundly unsatisfactory. He said—

> "The Militia is what the War Office has made it, and the War Office alone is responsible for its failure and shortcomings. The military officials at the War Office know nothing about the Militia at all."

I conclude from what I have heard this afternoon that, in the opinion of those able to judge, the conditions of the Militia are very much the same now as they were then. But, my Lords, I did not rise to make a speech on the Militia. I rose to call attention to one passage in the Secretary of State's speech which bears on the question of the Militia and the Volunteers, and is, therefore, germane to the matter now under discussion. The Secretary of State, in his speech, adumbrated a sort of citizen army composed of the Militia and the Volunteers, in order to effect those economies which both sides of the House are anxious to secure in regard to the administration of the War Office. He said that he looked to the use of men who did not give the whole of their time to military service to bring about economy in Army expenditure. Supposing the Secretary of State is able to create this citizen army, it seems to me there will still remain the essence, the crux, of the problem which Mr. Arnold-Forster himself had to face in his scheme—that is to say, whether the soldiers of that citizen army will be bound to serve abroad.

If economy is going to be brought about by the creation of a citizen army and the preservation of the Militia, it follows that my right hon. friend the Secretary of State will have to cut down his striking force to its effective minimum. Then, in moments of danger, having reduced his striking force to its lowest limit, he must be absolutely certain of the Reserves he calls out from the Militia. He must not leave it to them to volunteer. If he did, he might find it somewhat difficult to get men; although I must admit that the Militia hitherto have volunteered when it has been necessary. But if my noble friend is going to rely on the Militia and the Volunteers for effective aid to a striking force of the regular Army, which he has cut down to its lowest possible limits, difficulty will certainly arise unless he is able to call on the whole of these men to go to his aid in the event of a great crisis abroad. I only put this point because it has not been alluded to this afternoon. I do not bring it forward by way of criticism of the Secretary of State. My right hon. friend made a speech putting forward his policy. It was a speech as statesmanlike as it was modest, and as modest as it was statesmanlike, and that speech has given him, not only the confidence of the nation, but, what I venture to think is a great deal more important, the confidence of the Army itself.

*THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: My Lords, after the epithets which were applied by my noble friend Lord Newton to the oratory which has been poured out this evening, I am rather diffident in rising to address your Lordships, but I can promise, after what has been said by my noble friends behind me who represent the Militia, that I shall be brief. I note the promise which Lord Newton makes that we are to have what I presume he would permit me to call a National Service League debate shortly, or, at all events, before the conclusion of the session. I for one will welcome that debate. We have been accustomed during the last few months to almost weekly pronouncements of policy by the National Service League. I am sure we shall welcome the opportunity of hearing once more a pronouncement of their views in your Lordships' House, and I think that most of us will also welcome the opportunity of again beating them in the division lobbies.

I entirely reciprocate what was said by the noble Earl the Under-Secretary as to the necessity of treating the subject before us with an absence of Party feeling. It is perhaps natural that noble Lords opposite, after the result of the general election, which I have no doubt they found very satisfactory, should be anxious to treat everything with an absence of Party feeling; but in this particular case I am sure we shall be most anxious to meet the noble Earl half-way. I think nothing proves more accurately the absence of Party feeling when these subjects are discussed in your Lordships' House than the impartial way in which Militia colonels attack the representative of the War Office, no matter to which Party he belongs.

The first point to which I would like to refer is the subject of signalling. I was rather disappointed that the noble Earl did not amplify a little more fully his remarks on that subject. I have been told of regiments which had hitherto been doing signalling, but which under the new orders are debarred from continuing it. One particular regiment has been singled out by the General Officer Commanding as a fit regiment to carry on their signalling exercises, but under the recent War Office decision these regiments are not permitted to do signalling any longer. I admit that the noble Earl the Under-Secretary holds out a possible hope that they may be able to resume at some future time, but for one training, at any rate, these regiments will be debarred from signalling exercises, and a great deal of the efforts they have made in the past will be wasted, even though next year they are allowed to continue. Signalling is a matter with which a man should keep constantly in touch, if he is to be of any use. I would suggest that the decision, at any rate of the particular regiment to which I have referred, should be reconsidered.

With regard to the abolition of the Militia Advisory Board, which was deplored by Lord Raglan, I would like to say a word. This is a matter in which I am not now individually concerned, but I hope we shall never see the Militia Advisory Board at the War Office again. I believe the noble Earl opposite has the advantage of an infinitely better system. He has a colonel of Militia at the War Office always at his beck and call, and I believe that to be a far better channel for communication between the heads of the War Office and the Militia than the Advisory Board. As to the accusation of Lord Haversham, whose maiden speech we all welcomed, that we were anxious two years ago to reform the Militia by wiping it out of existence, I must protest against that statement. I have repeatedly had to argue against the view that it correctly represents what we proposed two years ago, and I am not going to repeat the same arguments now. I content myself with stating that I deny its accuracy.

I recognise the experiment which the War Office is going to carry out as an old friend. It was worked out in the Adjutant-General's Department last autumn. One of our last actions as an Army Council, before noble Lords opposite succeeded us, was to discuss that scheme; and I think I recognise in the very short paragraph referring to this matter in the Memorandum on the Army Estimates the main headlines of the scheme we then discussed.

LORD LOVAT: Was it not the direct recommendation of the Norfolk Commission?

*THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: Yes. The scheme was based on some of the recommendations of the Norfolk Commission. It must not, however, be forgotten that those recommendations required a great deal of working out in the War Office before they could be acted upon or even adopted. But there are one or two omissions from the scheme which we discussed at the end of last November — omissions in the announcement made by the Secretary of State for War, omissions also in the speech of the Under-Secretary this evening. I should like very much if some member of His Majesty's Government would tell us, firstly, if these omissions are to be made, and secondly, why they are made. The first omission was referred to shortly by the noble Earl. We had discussed this scheme and given it practical approval. We are gratified to see that the present Government have adopted some of the suggestions we viewed with a favourable eye, but still we had discussed the question of organisation, and had practically agreed that a brigade organisation was necessary, and that the Militia was to be organised in brigades under a permanent commander. I would like to ask, is that organisation into brigades definitely dropped, or is it dropped pending further consideration? Is it part of the scheme still, and only left out for the obvious reason that you cannot put the whole scheme into a short Memorandum such as that which precedes the Army Estimates?

I would also like to ask a question as to the Royal Garrison Artillery. The Royal Garrison Artillery have a number of Militia regiments which have never been included in any defence scheme of any kind. They are most of them in Ireland, and the story we were all told was that when they were raised a hundred years ago it was thought safer to give forty Irishmen one big gun between them than a musket each. But what is going to be done with these seventeen or eighteen regiments of Garrison Artillery? Are they going to be retained, or are they to be reduced? War Office Committees have nearly always recommended that they should be done away with. Last autumn suggestions were brought forward that they might be useful as ammunition columns. I should like to know if His Majesty's Government have considered the future of these regiments.

The last omission from this scheme, which was referred to by my noble friend Lord Raglan, is far the most serious—namely, what is going to be done about the Militia Bill which was passed by your Lordships' House last year? That Bill was opposed by the noble Marquess opposite, the present Leader of the House; but I think he will permit me to say that he did not express any very great objection to the principle of the Bill, but objected to it because we did not state enough as to what we were going to do in regard to the Militia. When this matter came up for discussion at the Army Council last autumn there was no doubt in the mind of any member of that body that practically this whole scheme depended on the Bill's being passed. I have documentary proof of it here. Those who were then my military colleagues at the War Office felt it of the very highest importance that we should employ money primarily to improve parts of our Army which were to be o use to us in service abroad. There isf really little objection to the Bill from the Militia, and there is nothing but the strongest enthusiasm for it among the military authorities at the War Office. I know that soldiers are very anxious to see this Bill passed, and I do hope that His Majesty's Government will be able to tell us that they intend to again present it to Parliament and to pass it into law. I am convinced that it will be of the very highest advantage both directly and indirectly to the military forces of the Crown.

I have only one other matter that I feel it my duty to bring before your Lordships. It is a matter that does not concern the War Office, though it does concern the Militia and His Majesty's Government. The noble Earl the Under-Secretary quoted certain reasons, the cogency of which no one will deny, for the deficiency in numbers of officers, and, above all for my particular purpose, men in the Militia. The annual report of the Inspector-General on recruiting, which has just been presented to Parliament, contains the following paragraph—

> "In Ireland articles in the Press have been published and placards posted to deter intending recruits from enlisting, and in England publications and leaflets have been issued by societies averse to military service. Thirteen leaflets published by one society were received in this office."

We are a very tolerant nation, and are becoming more tolerant every day, but it is getting a little strong, I think, when we stand open and unchecked attempts to influence people not to serve their country. It is no new thing; it has been going on for some considerable time, and at the risk of wearying your Lordships, I would ask you to listen to some specimens of the sort of thing that has been published in Ireland during the last year or two. Here is a case of the Gaelic Athletic Association in Ireland, a body on a par with the Amateur Athletic Association in England. The rules of this Association, according to an extract from the Freeman's Journal of 19th August last year, provide that—

> "Permits shall not be granted to promoters of athletic meetings held under the auspices of the constabulary or any other section of the British garrison; that police, soldiers, militiamen, or sailors of the Royal Navy shall not be allowed to compete at athletic meetings held under such auspices, and that no permit shall be granted to a sports promoting body that would allow a military or police band to be present."

On 5th August last year the Dublin Leader contained an account of a speech made at Tallow by a certain Father Kavanagh. Father Kavanagh said—

> "If the majority of professed Irishmen were sincere in their profession, would England find in the Irish people a nation from which she always could recruit her Army and Navy?"

At the same meeting Mr. Davitt said—

> "Why should any Irishman join the English Army? Can any honest, self-respecting countryman offer a solitary reason why the English Army is or ought to be one iota less objectionable to young Irishmen than the Russian Army is to the men of Finland?"

I hope I am not wearying your Lordships, but I think it right that the House should be made aware of these things. In the Irish Times of 14th September last year there is an account of a meeting of the Gaelic League held in St. Patrick's School, Strokestown, at which the following resolution was passed—

> "We are of opinion that it is the duty of all Gaelic Leaguers, although the Gaelic League is a non-political association, to be disloyal to the British Government and her representatives in this country, to weaken its influence as far as possible, and in particular to use all their efforts to prevent all classes of our countrymen from enlisting in the British Army as long as the Government continue to show their utter contempt for everything Irish."

*THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Marquess of RIPON): The noble Earl is wandering from the subject before the House.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: The noble Marquess accuses me of wandering from the subject. Have anti-recruiting placards and resolutions nothing whatever to do with the Militia? I think they have. I am sorry if I am boring the noble Marquess.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: I am not bored.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: I have in my hand an extract which goes to show that this sort of thing is going on even now, when we are all living so happily under the Government of noble Lords opposite. A placard which was circulated in County Longford during the last week in December, called upon Irishmen to—

> "Make a vow that you will not recognise or mix with any man who dons the livery of an Irish slave—a red or black coat, or blue jacket—and keep your children from mixing with this anti-Irish horde—the slaughterers of the innocent Boer women and children."

And I may inform your Lordships that a testimonial is being got up to a gentleman who has just come out of gaol after serving nine months for distributing these placards.

The point I wish to enforce is this. This agitation has been going on in Ireland for a year; its primary object is to sow dissension between the two countries, and to engender a separatist feeling. I do not pretend that I think that that feeling will be very unpopular with noble Lords opposite, but its secondary effect must be to affect recruiting in Ireland. My right hon. friend Mr. Walter Long certainly checked this movement by prosecuting the prime movers in it whenever he could catch them; but all prosecutions in this matter have been stopped by the present Chief Secretary. Let us understand that noble Lords opposite, in stopping these prosecutions, are doing so with their eyes open. Let us know that they realise the results which will follow; and if recruiting in Ireland shows a still further diminution, as rumours tell us it is beginning to do, do not let us be told that the county interest in the Militia is being lost, and that the Volunteers are competing with the Militia. If noble Lords opposite choose to let this movement—this very wrong movement, as I claim it to be—go on, they must be prepared to take the consequences, and it will not lie in their mouths to grumble at any diminution of recruiting in Ireland as the result of these highly seditious publications.

*Lord MONKSWELL: My Lords, I should like to draw attention to a statement made in the other House by the Secretary of State for War, who gave what is to me a new version of the "blue-water" school, and one which seems to be of the utmost importance. The Secretary of State declared that in his view, not only can there be no invasion of England in force, but that there cannot even be a raid of 5,000 or 10,000 troops. If this is the deliberate opinion of the Secretary of State for War, and if he finds that the country is with him in that opinion, surely it foreshadows a most revolutionary change in regard to the Auxiliary Forces. What the Norfolk Commission said of the Militia was that they existed chiefly, and that the Volunteers existed solely, with a view to resisting invasion.

It appears to me that the new view of the "blue-water" school is totally different from that which was put forward last year in this House when the Militia Bill was being discussed. At that time noble Lords accepted the view that there was a possibility of an invasion of this country by a small foreign force and that the Militia and Volunteers—the Auxiliary Forces in general—must be maintained partly, if not solely, for the purpose of resisting invasion. But now we are told that there is no possibility of invasion. Consequently our Army is for the future to be what I may call a triple-expansion Army. The first expansion is to be when you call out the Reserves; the second takes place on the embodiment of the Militia; and the third when you call upon the Volunteers to fight outside this country, because it seems they will never be called upon to fight within the country. In these circumstances it seems to me difficult to imagine that the Secretary of State for War will not make the Militia liable to foreign service, because if you do not make the Militia so liable, and if you say definitely that never under any circumstances can they be called upon to fight in this country, you will do away altogether with the utility of that force. It is perfectly true that last year I voted against the Militia having liability for foreign service thrown upon them on embodiment. The noble Marquess the Leader of the House, who also objected to the proposal, did so simply on the ground that it was not part of a general scheme; that it was, I think he called it, an isolated change. That was the principal reason why he objected to the Militia on embodiment being available for foreign service. One word with regard to a small point taken up by Lord Raglan. I would suggest to Lord Raglan that he should not press his suggestion that Militia officers should be eligible to serve in the Indian Police, because for that service special qualifications are required, in particular a knowledge of the native languages and of law.

*Lord RAGLAN: But do they learn the languages before they go to the country?

*Lord MONKSWELL: I did not understand the noble Lord to suggest that Militia officers should go through the examination at present gone through for the Indian Police.

*Lord RAGLAN: I meant that.

*Lord MONKSWELL: That, of course, alters the position. Before sitting down I would express the hope that the noble Marquess the Leader of the House will give your Lordships some light and leading on the important point as to whether the Militia, on embodiment, are, or are not, to be liable for foreign service.

*The Marquess of RIPON: My Lords, I do not think that my noble friend who has just sat down quite rightly understood what was said by my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for War. I do not remember his having said anything exactly of the kind my noble friend has suggested, but I will inform myself as to what was the exact statement made on that subject. On the main subject which has been discussed to-night we have had a very interesting debate. We have had many interesting debates on the Militia in this House, always, I am afraid, in the same tone, that the Militia is in an unsatisfactory condition. It has been so, I am sorry to say, for a long time. It is highly important, it is a matter of the greatest importance, that steps should be taken to alter that condition of things and to bring about a more satisfactory state of matters. But it is the view of my right hon. friend the Secretary of State and of His Majesty's Government, that after so many Army schemes of one sort and another, sometimes very wide and very extensive, and sometimes dealing only with individual points, have been before the public and Parliament, the time has come when the general question of Army organisation, and of the Militia as part of the general question, ought to be deliberately considered in all its bearings by the Government, and that no partial expression of opinion, except on minor points, should be given to the public until time has been taken for full and deliberate consideration.

His Majesty's Government have been in office but a short time. I think it would have been very wrong on the part of my right hon. friend if he had attempted to deal hastily with this question. We have had Secretaries of State with preconceived opinions on this subject, who have entered on office with the intention of carrying those opinions into effect. They have not been a success; those schemes have one and all broken down. My right hon. friend Mr Haldane does not desire to put forward another scheme of that kind, and I think, my Lords, that he is acting wisely in that course. He is entitled to the support of Parliament when he declines to commit himself to the details of arrangements connected with general Army organisation until such time as he has had full opportunity, after the freest and most intimate concert and consultation with his expert advisers, to present a general scheme, and if the statement which it has been in the power of my noble friend the Under-Secretary of State for War to make to this House to-night seems to any extent to be limited and narrow, it is because my right hon. friend does not desire to enter piecemeal into this question, but to deal with it, as I have said, as a whole.

The noble Earl opposite alluded especially to the Militia Bill of last year. I took objection to that Bill on various grounds when it was passing through this House. The principal point that I put forward was that it was undesirable to deal partially with a large question of that kind. To that opinion I adhere. That is the opinion of my right hon. friend, and, therefore, there is, as far as I know, no intention of proposing that Bill again this session. I was, I confess, a little surprised to find that the noble Earl opposite attached such extreme importance to that measure, and that he thought it was of such vital interest that it should be passed. Noble Lords opposite could have passed it last year. They sent the Bill down to the House of Commons; it was there in the hands of the then Government with their majority, but they refused to pass it, preferring to pass the Aliens Bill. I think, therefore, that my noble friend has no right to speak as if we were neglecting our duty in this respect because we hesitate to play the game which was played last year, and because we preferr to deal with this question as a whole.

I did not intend to interrupt the noble Earl in another part of his speech. I made a remark to my noble friend beside me which reached the quick ears of my noble friend, but I still think that he did wander from the subject on the notice of the Paper. The subject of the notice relates entirely to the Militia. The extracts which the noble Earl read from the newspapers and placards in Ireland related to the subject of recruiting generally, and I do think that the noble Earl was somewhat out of order. I am quite sure that if the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack had the authority in this House which the Speaker has in the other House, my noble friend would have been called to order. All I have to say on that matter is this, I do not believe that placards and notices of that description have any material effect on recruiting in Ireland. The Irish people are a race of soldiers. The Irish people have, as we all know, done great and gallant service for this country, and I do not believe that ill-advised articles of that description and placards of that sort will really be found to check the Irish people from recruiting. If I am right in that opinion, it would be unwise to resort to the measures which the noble Earl sketched out. I think it is much wiser to abstain from taking stringent measures for the purpose of dealing with an evil which I believe to be in itself of comparatively little importance.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, after the speech of my noble friend Lord Newton I feel that it requires some courage on the part of one who is a Lord-Lieutenant of his county and who has been a Secretary of State for War to address even a few words to your Lordships in this debate. I cannot but consider that the matter which was mentioned at the close of his speech by my noble friend Lord Donoughmore deserves the most serious consideration. I can well understand that the noble Marquess opposite should not have been prepared to find it discussed this evening, and that he should not therefore care to pursue it further; but it does seem to me to be a matter of the gravest importance. Its importance is, I think, not to be measured by the effect of these placards and incitements upon recruiting; what is serious is that in a part of the United Kingdom ill-affected persons should be allowed with impunity to discourage their fellow-citizens from entering a service in connection with which, as the noble Marquess reminded the House, Irishmen have conferred so much distinction upon the history of this country.

Turning to the main question, your Lordships may perhaps have listened with some little disappointment to the statements vouchsafed to us from the Front Bench opposite, but I am bound to say that the appeal of the noble Marquess seemed to me a reasonable one. It is reasonable that His Majesty's Government should desire to deal with this great question of Army organisation as a whole, and we shall certainly not grudge them the time necessary for that purpose. It is true that nothing could be more unfortunate than the present condition of the Militia force; we have often had to admit it on both sides of the House.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Why?

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My noble friend at the Table asks me why. One answer was given earlier in the evening by the noble Lord who spoke first, and who told us that Army reformers had only two ways of treating the Militia—obliterating it abruptly or condemning it to a lingering death. I do not admit the justice of that description. I think it would be fairer to say that there are two currents of thought with regard to the Militia. On the one hand you have the school which desires to introduce reforms of a thorough and drastic character; on the other hand you have the feeling of friends of the Militia whose frame of mind is intensely conservative; and between these two stools Militia reformers have often fallen. The Militia difficulty seems to me, indeed, to be typical of the difficulty which attends the whole question of Army organisation in this country. This country has military requirements probably more extensive geographically and more complicated than any other European nation; and yet I think it true to say that we have an Army which has never been constructed on a scientific basis, which has grown with the growth of the nation, and which therefore is irregular and overlapping in its constitution. The force which has suffered most from that condition of things is undoubtedly the Militia; it has been plundered at one end by the Line, it has been encroached on at the other by the Volunteers; and the result is that at this moment it is in the condition which was described by the Secretary of State for War when he said it had been bled white and is in a state of inanition. We are well content that time should be taken to investigate this Militia question thoroughly; and I, for one, am grateful to the Secretary of State for War, in the first place, for his frank admission that the Army, as a whole, never was more efficient than at present, and also for his readiness to examine all these questions with an open mind and with the desire as far as possible to observe continuity of military policy. For the present we are to have, with regard to the Militia, a very important experiment, and we shall watch that experiment with great interest. It contains one or two features which I regard not without a certain amount of misgiving. I am not sure whether the endeavour to require from the Militia a much longer period of training is a step which will increase the popularity of the force. Mr. Haldane described the Militiaman the other day as a soldier who was one-tenth soldier and nine-tenths civilian, and that is a consideration of which we should never lose sight. It seems to me that anything which you do to diminish the value of the militiaman as a civilian in the labour market during that part of the year when he is not occupied as a soldier is likely to render service in the Militia more onerous, and therefore less attractive, in the eyes of the public.

Again, there is the announcement with regard to winter training. It may be a very good thing; but I earnestly hope that care will be taken not to create the impression in the public mind that an attempt is being made, as I have seen it described, to transfer the cost of outdoor relief to the Army Estimates. If that impression gets abroad, the result will be deplorable. It is also part of the experiment that these more thoroughly trained Militiamen are not to be allowed, during their first year, to be transferred into the Line. That is a suggestion which appeals to me very much, but it must not be forgotten that the effect will be to deprive the Line of a large part of the recruits on which it has hitherto depended. We have been in the habit of robbing Peter to pay Paul, and if we stop doing so Paul will have to go short. I understand from the noble Marquess that the mind of the Secretary of State is open upon the subject of the Bill rendering Militiamen liable for service abroad, and that we are not to infer that it has been dropped. We regard it as a measure of very great importance—and that is not less true because we were unable to find a sufficient amount of Parliamentary time to pass it into law last session. My reason for considering the Bill of very great importance is this. I cannot conceive of any arrangement under which we should be able to avoid occasionally and in times of emergency employing the Militia beyond the limits of these islands; and, if we are to do that, we should do it under statutory powers and not by means of the kind of extemporised arrangements which used to be made and to which I have heard the strongest exception taken in debate in this House. Militia battalions used to be publicly paraded and invited to declare then and at once whether they would or would not undertake the liability for foreign service. Of course in the circumstances it was almost impossible for them to say "No," and very disagreeable things used to be said as to the kind of moral pressure put upon them in order to obtain their consent. That can only be avoided by imposing on the Militia a statutory liability to serve abroad at certain contingencies.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: What about compulsory service?

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My noble friend asks me about compulsory service. I have very often ventured to tell your Lordships that in my opinion compulsory service was not likely to be regarded with favour in this country, and I for one shall base my hopes on the attempts of His Majesty's Government to solve this Militia problem without having recourse to compulsion in any shape or form.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS. CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Cost of Shipbuilding at Pembroke Dockyard.

MR. O. C. PHILIPPS (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty if his attention has been drawn to the fact that, according to the Navy Estimates, the "Duke of Edinburgh," which has just been built at Pembroke Dockyard, is costing, exclusive of armaments, about £48,000 less than the sister ship "Achilles," building by Messrs. Armstrong; about £57,000 less than the sister ship "Cochrane," building by the Fairfield Shipbuilding Company; about £60,000 less than the sister ship "Black Prince," building by the Thames Ironworks, and about £75,000 less than the "Natal," building by Messrs. Vickers Maxim; and whether, in view of this saving to the taxpayers, he will consider the question of allocating to Pembroke Dockyard one of the two new ships not yet placed which are included in the Estimates for 1906–7.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson. The cost of the "Achilles," "Cochrane," and "Natal" is not directly comparable with that of the "Duke of Edinburgh," as the considerable alteration made in the design of the three former vessels since they were laid down has resulted in an increase over the original Estimate. As there is no sister ship to the "Duke of Edinburgh" building in a Government dockyard, this vessel affords no basis of comparison between the cost of building at Pembroke and at other Government dockyards.

Salaries of London Telegraph Clerks.

MR. GODDARD CLARK (Camberwell, Peckham): To ask the Postmaster-General whether, in view of the fact that for a number of years the Civil Service Commissioners issued papers to the competitors for the position of telegraph clerks in London, promising successful candidates a prospect of a salary of £190 per annum, he will state the number of telegraphists in the Central Office, London, who are in the receipt of a salary of £3 2s. per week, and also the number of men who received this promise from the Commissioners who are on a scale of wage covering the prospect of £190 per annum.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) As regards the first part of the Question, the matter is in dispute and is engaging my attention; the figures asked for by the hon. Member would be misleading.

Post Office Inspection—Sorter-Tracers Branch.

MR. RADFORD (Islington, E.): To ask the Postmaster General whether, having regard to the fact that he is making a tour of inspection of the various departments of the General Post Office, he will extend it and inspect the work performed by the members of the Sorter-Tracers' and Tracers' Associations who are attached to the Inland and Foreign Telegraph Branches of the Accountant General's Department.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I am, as far as time permits, making a personal inspection of the practical working of various departments of the Post Office in turn.

Repurchase of Stamps by Post Offices.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Postmaster-General if he can say on what grounds a regulation was made forbidding the exchange of stamps for cash by the public at post offices; and whether, seeing that this regulation is inconvenient to a certain section of the community, he will consider the advisability of withdrawing the same.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The present regulations prohibiting the repurchase of postage stamps from the public over the counter of post offices were made with a view to impose a check on the pilfering of stamps from employers, and on the use of stamps for remittances, a practice which was found to lead to the theft of letters. It was also desirable, on sanitary grounds, to stop the re-issue of repurchased stamps to the public. The regulations are working smoothly, and I see no reason for altering them.

Toll Bars at Middlesborough.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON (Middlesbrough): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the inconvenience caused by the toll bars which are maintained at the present time on the main roads to and from Middlesbrough; whether he is aware that on the main road from Middlesbrough to South Bank there are three toll bars within less than a mile of each other, and that there is only one main road from Middlesbrough which is free from toll; and whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the number of toll bars at present in existence in England, and the conditions of their existence, with a view to promoting legislation giving power to local authorities to take over and maintain the roads and dispense with toll bars without compensation, and to prevent the erection of toll bars in the future.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) My attention has been called to the existence of toll bars on roads leading out of Middlesbrough, and I am in communication with the town council of the borough with regard to the matter. I have no information to show that there is need for inquiry as to the number of toll bars in existence in England and the other matter referred to in the last part of the Question, and I could not promise to promote legislation dealing with the subject.

Fatal Accident on board s.s. "Pembie."

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received any report with regard to the accident in the river, near Old Calabar, which happened on board the s.s. "Pembie," formerly the s.s. "Croxdale," whereby two men were suffocated in the ship's bunkers; whether he is aware that the master proceeded to take the ship to sea instead of stopping the vessel and obtaining assistance from the shore in recovering the bodies of the men from the bunkers; and whether he can say if any proper inquiry has been held into the circumstances relating to the death of the two men; and if not, will he cause inquiry to be made at an early date.

(Answered by Mr. Kearley.) The Board of Trade have received very full Reports relating to the accident on board the "Nembe," which I shall have pleasure in showing to the hon. Member if he desires to see them. Unfortunately, the lives of two men were lost. Only a few men could work at a time in the reserve bunker, and, although every effort was made under the superintendence of the chief officer, it was only after three hours strenuous efforts that the bodies of the men were recovered. An inquiry was held by the acting superintendent at Barbados, who reported, after examining six witnesses, that the occurrence could not have been prevented and that no one was to blame. A further inquiry was held by the acting superintendent at Port Talbot, by whom ten other witnesses were examined, who were unanimous that the accident was unavoidable and that everything possible was done to rescue the unfortunate men. The "Nembe" has been carefully examined by the Board of Trade surveyors, who report that there is nothing about the formation of the bunkers to call for any action on their part. The Board are advised that, having regard to the position of the vessel and other circumstances, the master would not have been justified in stopping the vessel.

Mutiny of Crew of s.s. "Epsom."

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received any Report from His Majesty's Consul at Naples relating to the alleged mutiny of a crew of Chinamen on board the s.s. "Epsom," which is under the management of Messrs. Watts Watts, who have had frequent trouble with Chinese crews; and whether he has received a Report as to the trouble with a Chinese crew on board the s.s. "Heathbank," now the "Wandsworth," under the same management; whether he is aware that the Chinese seamen employed on this vessel claimed their discharge and wages on the ground of a change of ownership, although the solicitors representing Messrs. Watts Watts informed the North Shields magistrates that there had been no change of ownership; whether he is aware that the crew refused to proceed in the ship, and were afterwards arrested at Newcastle on the master's instructions; that when the case was tried before the magistrate, no interpreter was present to explain the men's objections to proceeding in the ship, and that they were ordered to be put on board by the Newcastle City Police; whether he is aware that, on the vessel proceeding down the Tyne, five Chinamen jumped overboard and one man was drowned, the captain making no attempt to rescue the men; whether he is aware that the managers alleged the change of ownership did not affect the men's agreement; and, seeing that a summons taken out against an official of the Seamen's Union, on the alleged ground that he had persuaded the men to desert, was dismissed, whether he will inquire into the disturbances on the s.s. "Epsom" at Naples, and the s.s. "Wandsworth," and say how many Chinese crews Messrs. Watts Watts are employing on board their vessels.

(Answered by Mr. Kearley.) The Board of Trade have not yet received any Report from the Naples Consul with regard to the case of the "Epsom," which is, I am informed, managed as stated by Messrs. Watts, Watts, and Company, but I have called for a Report, and hope to receive it in a few days. With respect to the "Heathbank" or "Wandsworth," the Registrar General of Seamen informs me that she was purchased by the Gracechurch Steamship Company, Limited (Harris and Dixon, managers), in November, 1905, and sold to the Britain Steamship Company, Limited (F. S. Watts, manager), in February, 1906. So far as my information goes, the facts in this case are as stated in the Question, but the owners state that the Chinese left the ship surreptitiously, and the captain had no knowledge of the circumstances at the time. As to whether, under articles of agreement, these men were liable to be transferred to another owner, this was the subject of legal proceedings at Newcastle, and the magistrates directed the men to return to their duty. I believe Messrs. Watts, Watts, and Company, Limited, carry many Chinese seamen, but as to how many I cannot say.

British Trade at Dalny.

MR. F. E. SMITH (Liverpool, Walton): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has taken any, and what, steps to ensure British traders having equal rights to those at present enjoyed by Japanese traders, who are admitted freely and without any restriction; whether he is aware, or has received, any complaints that the Japanese authorities are imposing duties upon the import of goods other than those of Japanese manufacture into the port of Dalny, although during the Russian occupation no such duties were imposed; and whether he has taken any, and, if so, what steps to prevent the injury to British commerce occasioned by the action of the Japanese authorities; and whether he has made, or will make, representations to the Government of Japan as to the desirability of the evacuation of Chinese territory by the Japanese troops at a date earlier than the full limit of time fixed by the Portsmouth treaty, having regard to the hindrance occasioned by the occupation to the free exchange of commerce between British traders and Chinese merchants.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Sir Edward Grey): Inquiries have been made, and we are informed that goods, irrespective of nationality, are entering Dalny duty free. The only exception known is a case of 50,000 cigarettes, the property of the British American Tobacco Company, on which duty appears to have been charged. His Majesty's Ambassador at Tokio has been requested by telegraph to inquire why an exception has been made in this case. We cannot ask the Japanese to vary the terms of the treaty with regard to the occupation, but telegraphic instructions were sent on 21st February to His Majesty's Minister at Peking, to cause inquiries to be made on the spot, with a view to seeing that the hindrance to trade was as little as possible, and our hope in this respect has been expressed to the Japanese Government.

Colonial Legislation Vetoed by the Imperial Government.

MR. RIDSDALE (Brighton): To ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, if he will state the occasions since 1870 upon which the Imperial veto has been exercised in respect of colonial measures, specifying date, colony, and subject vetoed; and if he will also state the occasions, if any, upon which this Imperial veto has been sustained or withdrawn.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) I think that a large amount of the information desired by the hon. Member will be given in the Return ordered by this House on the 6th instant.† If the hon. Member will indicate the points on which he would like that Return to be supplemented the Secretary of State for the Colonies will consider how far it is possible to meet his wishes.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, will he say what is the production of gold per ton of ore milled in the Australian Colonies, excluding gold won from alluvial washings and dredgings.

	Tons.	Average Yield per Ton.
Victoria - - - -	1,078,433	9 dwt.
New South Wales - -	367,227	10 dwt. 15 grains.
New Zealand - -	447,969	13·54 dwt.

In Tasmania in 1903 the total gold was 61,826 crude ounces or 59,891 fine ounces, of a value of £254,403; the figures for quartz mining do not appear to be given separately for the years since 1899, when 49,029 tons were treated, yielding 37,402 ounces, an average yield of 15 dwt. 6 grains per ton. In South Australia the production of gold is not large, £90,031 in 1903. The value of the gold per ounce varies in the different States; in 1903 it was as follows: Victoria £3 19s. 3d.; New South Wales, £3 12s. 8d.; Western Australia, £3 12s.; Queensland, £3 1s. 8d.; New Zealand, £3 16s. 5d.; Tasmania, about £3 15s.; South Australia, £3 7s. 6d. In Victoria, for ten years, 1895–1904, the average yield has varied between 9·7 dwt. and 8·4 dwt. In the Transvaal the yield in August, 1899, was 9·599 dwts. fine gold per ton crushed, in June, 1905, the yield was 8·473.

Living-in System—Precautions against Fire.

MR. SEDDON (Lancashire, Newton): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will take steps to secure from all local authorities the number of persons who have lost their lives through fire, upon premises where they are compelled to sleep in, under the living-in system; and also whether, by Order in Council, he will empower all local authorities to apply the same supervision to premises where shop assistants sleep in that are applied to common lodging-houses.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) As to the first part of the Question, I share the view expressed by my right hon. friend the Home Secretary, on the 8th instant,† in reply to a Question on the subject. I do not think it would be practicable to obtain from the local authorities the information desired. As to the second part of the Question, I am not aware of any legal authority for the issue of an Order in Council for the purpose referred to.

Reduction of the Royal Marines.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether there has been a reduction of 1,145 in the total force of Royal Marines in the past year; whether further reductions are to follow; and whether these changes, coupled with the fact that specialist marine officers, wearing the uniform of the corps, are no longer to be entered, foreshadow the abolition of the Royal Marine Light Infantry and the Royal Marine Artillery.

† See (4) Debates, cliii., 633.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The answer to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative, the reduction being due to the decreased requirements of the Fleet, consequent upon the recent reorganisation. No further reduction will be made during 1906–7. The answer to the last part of the Question is in the negative.

Manufactured Tobacco for the Navy.

MR. F. E. SMITH: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Admiralty have completed their experiments in manufactured tobacco for the Navy; whether he intends to invite tenders for the supply of such tobacco; and, if so, when.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The supply of manufactured tobacco for the Navy is still in an experimental stage. A further and more extended trial of a blend milder than the ordinary Service tobacco has been arranged for, and when the results of this trial are known the Admiralty will be in a position to decide to what extent there is a desire on the part of the men for the introduction of such a manufactured tobacco, as an alternative to the ordinary Navy tobacco.

Clerical Appointments to the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland.

MR. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland has refused to institute competitive examinations in connection with clerical appointments, whilst the Dublin Corporation, the Belfast Corporation, the Great Southern and Western Railway, and other similar bodies have instituted such examinations; whether the manner in which the company uses its powers of patronage has been brought to his knowledge; and whether, seeing that the company derives its monopoly from Parliament, he proposes to take steps to compel it to open the appointments on its clerical staff to competitive examination.

(Mr. Lloyd-George.) No, Sir; I have no information on this subject. The matter is one in which the Board of Trade have no authority to interfere with the discretion of the railway company.

Flooding of the Island of Greenborough.

MR. H. H. MARKS (Kent, Thanet): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has any information with reference to the partial destruction of the island of Greenborough, in the Medway, by floods; whether the flooding of this island constitutes a danger to the Sheppy isles; and whether he can state what action is being taken in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) The Board of Trade have received no information as to the alleged destruction of the isle of Greenborough. I have been in communication with the clerk to the Medway Conservancy, who informs me that an island 2,000 yards wide and two creeks lie between the island of Greenborough and the isle of Sheppey, so that it is difficult to see how the isle of Sheppey could be in danger by the flooding of Greenborough. I am further informed that breaches in the sea walls along the river side are continually happening and are repaired by the owners of the adjoining lands.

Explosion on the Dearne Valley Railway near Doncaster.

MR. J. WARD (Stoke-on-Trent): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the accident caused by the explosion of a charge of gelignite, on the Dearne Valley Railway, now in course of construction, at Loversall, near Doncaster, which resulted in three men being killed and four others being seriously injured; and whether he will cause a full inquiry into the cause and circumstances of such accident, under the powers conferred upon him by the Notice of Accidents Act, 1894.

(Answered by Mr. Kearley.) The accident in question has been reported to the Board of Trade, and, as it was due to the use of explosives, copies of the notices received have been forwarded to the Home Office for the information of His Majesty's Inspector of Explosives. I propose to leave it to the Secretary of State to determine whether or no an inquiry under the Explosives Acts is necessary.

Mr. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): To ask the hon. Member for the Hallam Division of Sheffield, as representing the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, whether he is aware that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have for some time past granted a licence for the removal of sand and shingle from the Fulwell foreshore, near Sunderland, and that, although the Commissioners have been appealed to by the Corporation of Sunderland and the South Shields Rural Council to determine such licence, on the ground of the damage to adjoining lands and public property by the incursions of the sea consequent upon such removal, the Commissioners have decided to continue to permit such removal, although the corporations in the immediate locality have discontinued it; and whether the Commissioners will reconsider their decision.

(Answered by Mr. Stuart Wortley.) Before the representations from the Corporation of Sunderland and the Rural District Council of South Shields were received by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners negotiations had been in progress with the Sunderland Rural District Council, the local authority within whose area the foreshore to which the Question refers is situate, and an agreement had practically been arrived at for a letting of the foreshore by the Commissioners to that district council. In pursuance of that agreement the requisite notice has already been given to revoke the licence under which sand and shingle have been removed from the foreshore during the last year.

The Unfunded Debt.

Mr. ASHTON (Bedfordshire, Luton): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he will state what is the amount of the unfunded debt of the country under its various heads at the present time.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) I should be glad if my honourable friend would kindly postpone his Question until the delivery of the Budget statement; as statements relating to the unfunded debt which are issued at different dates are apt to mislead.

Seals in Youghal Bay—Damage to Fisheries.

Captain DONELAN (Cork, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the damage caused to the salmon fishing industry in the vicinity of Youghal, county Cork, by the numbers of seals which frequent Youghal Bay; and whether steps will be taken with a view to the abatement of the nuisance.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The attention of the Department of Agriculture has been drawn to the damage done by seals to the salmon fisheries in Youghal Bay and harbour. The local Board of Conservators give rewards for the destruction of seals, and about a dozen such rewards have been given during the past few years. The Department will communicate with the conservators with the object of bringing about an abatement of the evil.

Sale of Mr. J. B. Little's Estate at Bawnboy.

Mr. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state what is the present position in regard to the estate of Mr. Joseph Bennet Little, over which Mr. T. F. Berry, Belturbet, is receiver, known as Lisanover Ranch, Bawnboy, county Cavan; have the Estates Comimssioners been approached locally; and when will this large tract be available for distribution.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The estate in question is to be sold in the Land Judges Court. It has been inspected by the Estates Commissioners, who hope shortly to be in a position to make an offer to purchase it.

Mr. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.) To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland (1) what is the total amount paid to local bodies under Section 58 (4) of The Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898, for the year ended 31st March, 1905; (2) what is the present amount of the accumulated balances under this section; (3) what amount would be required to pay the full amount over 1s. in the £ of railway and harbour charges for the year ended 31st March, 1905; and (4) what amount would be required to pay the full amount over 9d. in the £ for the same purposes for the year ended 31st March, 1905.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) (1) £12,524 19s. 11d. (2) On 31st December, 1905, a sum of £75,320 12s. stood to the credit of the deposit account for licence duties under the section quoted. (3) £9,634 17s. 6d. (4) £15,449 19s. 10d.

Purchase of Land by Mrs. Lambert on the Goodbody Estate, Athenry.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will say whether Mrs. Lambert, of Castle Ellen, Athenry, has purchased from the Commissioners, in or about fifty acres of untenanted land on the Goodbody estate, Athenry; how much of the said land was under timber; and whether any applications reached the Estates Commissioners applying for a holding on this farm.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the Estates Commissioners that Mrs. Lambert has agreed to purchase from them a portion of this estate comprising eighty-five acres, of which about eighty-one acres are under timber. No application for these particular lands was received from any one except Mrs. Lambert.

Application for Land on the Goodbody Estate.

MR. DUFFY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any representation has been made to the Estates Commissioners by the people of Athenry in respect to the 311 acres of mountain land for which Mrs. Lopdell is negotiating purchase with the Commissioners; and will he say how much of this land is under timber, and were any applications received by the Estate Commissioners for a portion of this land from small holders and people living in the vicinity.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that all applications for land on the Goodbody estate were duly considered when the estate was being dealt with. Eleven acres out of the lot which Mrs. Lopdell is purchasing consist of land under timber. No application for this particular lot was received by the Estates Commissioners.

Suggested Fish Curing Station at Arklow.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Wexford, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will draw the attention of the Department of Agriculture to the desirability of establishing a fish-curing station at Arklow.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Department of Agriculture will inquire into this matter, but, having regard to the great facilities for the fresh fish trade which exists at Arklow, it is doubtful whether curing operations would be profitable.

Drainage of Lough Neagh—Sir A. Binnie's Report.

MR. BARRIE (Londonderry, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state what action he proposes to take on Sir A. Binnie's Report re the drainage of Lough Neagh and the Bann.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Report will be considered by the Government as soon as practicable. I am not yet in a position to state what action will be taken upon it.

Purchase of the Dunne Estate, Aughaboe, Queen's County.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what is the result of the negotiations for purchase which the Estates Commissioners have been conducting with the Land Judges' Court relative to the Dunne estate, Aughaboe, Queen's County.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The negotiations have not yet been concluded.

Intimidation of the Gaelic Football Club at Markethill, County Armagh.

MR. McKILLOP (Armagh. S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the posting of threatening notices in the town of Markethill, county Armagh, directed against the local Gaelic Football Club, its members and supporters, and also to the fact that on various dates, from November, 1905, up to the beginning of the present month, their grounds have been trespassed on, goal posts removed, and the ground itself strewn with broken glass, rendering it useless, and that up to the present date those responsible for these actions have not been brought to justice; and whether he will take immediate steps to put an end to such incidents.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the police authorities that, some months ago, a Gaelic football club, numbering about twenty persons, was established at Mullaghbrack, near Markethill. The first match played by the club took place on Sunday, the 25th February, and great objection to the playing of the match on a Sunday was taken by the residents of the locality, who are almost exclusively Protestant. On the 3rd March the football ground was found to be thickly strewn with broken glass, and a threatening notice, directed against the promoters of the club, was found upon a tree in the vicinity. No complaints as to trespass upon the field have been made to the police. The goal posts were removed by a member of the club for safety. The police have used every exertion to trace the offenders in this matter, but, so far, unsuccessfully. They are taking all possible measures to preserve the peace.

Sunday Football at Markethill, County Armagh.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a Gaelic football club at Markethill, county Armagh, persistently play football and hurley on Sundays in a field close to the parish church of Mullaback, county Armagh, a district which is almost exclusively Protestant; and whether steps will be taken to put a stop to such proceedings.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I beg to refer to the Reply which I have now given to the Question of the hon. Member for South Armagh.† The football field in question is 300 yards from Mullaghbrack parish church. Football matches were played in this field on Sundays, 25th February, 4th and 11th March. The police have no power to interfere in this matter, but they will use every effort to preserve the peace.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

The Navy League.

MR. KING (Cheshire, Knutsford): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is aware that a lecture was recently given to a school for girls in St. Andrews by Lieutenant Knox, of the Navy League, and that after the lecture a number of schoolgirls were enrolled members of the Navy League; and whether this proceeding has the sanction of the Admiralty.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON, Dundee): Lieutenant Knox is not now in His Majesty's service, and the whole proceedings are outside the jurisdiction of the Admiralty.

Cadet Nominations to Osborne.

*SIR PHILIP MAGNUS (London University): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether nominations to Osborne are awarded to candidates, subject to their passing qualifying examinations, absolutely on the result of the interview and the written Reports, or whether the results are liable to be influenced by other considerations.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The Answer to the first Question is in the affirmative.

The 16th Lancers.

MR. LEA (St. Pancras, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will order some inquiry to be made as to the cause of the amount of crime in the 16th Lancers during the twelve months ending February 28th last, seeing that during that period seventy-five courts martial were held in the regiment, besides 300 other regimental entries having been awarded in addition; and if he will give the result of that inquiry.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): I do not think this is a matter which calls for a special inquiry, but as the hon. Member has raised the question, the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief Eastern Command has been requested to furnish a Report. This Report will be confidential.

MR. LEA: May I ask the right hon. Gentlemen whether he does not think that this amount of punishment points to the fact that there is an enormous amount of crime in the regiment, and that either there is the finest collection of bad characters in the 16th Lancers or else that there is something radically wrong with the system?

MR. HALDANE: I will consider the matter when I get the information.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover): Will the right hon. Gentlemen consider the facts that a large number of these men joined the regiment in South Africa during the later stages of the war, that the regiment has lately returned home after fourteen years' service abroad with hardly any non-commissioned officers, and that many of the men have had no experience of life in English towns?

MR. HALDANE: I will take all that into consideration.

Jamaican Tariffs.

MR. LAMONT (Buteshire): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in view of the fact that the existing import tariff of Jamaica expires on June 1st, 1906, he will suggest to the Governor of that Colony that it is desirable to encourage inter-Colonial free trade among the British West Indian Possessions, and that this opportunity might therefore be taken of bringing the new Jamaican tariff, so far as the necessities of revenue permit, into uniformity with the lower scale of customs duties already prevailing in the Colony of Trinidad.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY FOR THE COLONIES (Mr CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): The Secretary of State would view with favour any measures tending to the establishment of inter-Colonial free trade in the British West Indies, though the possibilites of such trade are necessarily limited by the similarity of their products; he is also in favour of the establishment of uniform tariffs in the different Colonies, and of the reduction of customs duties wherever possible; but as these duties are imposed solely for revenue purposes, the possibility of effecting reductions depends upon the financial position. Jamaica has very recently abolished the surtax of 6 per cent. upon the customs tariff which was imposed last year.

Native Labour in South Africa—Deficiency.

Mr. GUY BARING (Winchester): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he has any official information alleging that there is a deficiency of native labour both for agricultural purposes and railway construction throughout South Africa; and whether he will lay Papers upon the Table.

MR. CHURCHILL: Information as to the deficiency of native labour is contained in the last Blue-book. A statement by Lord Selborne may be referred to at page 64 of Cd. 2819. To what extent the supply is capable of increase cannot be definitely anticipated, but it appears that in April last there was a larger supply of native labour in the Transvaal than at any previous period. It has since decreased to some extent.

Colonial Contributions to the Imperial Institute.

MR. LAIDLAW (Renfrewshire, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will lay upon the Table a Statement showing separately amounts contributed to the Imperial Institute out of the Revenues of the self-supporting Colonies, and the Dependencies and Protectorates under the charge of the Colonial Office; and showing under what heads, or for what purpose, such contributions have in each case been allotted.

Mr. CHURCHILL: The list would take a long time to read, and I think I shall be consulting the convenience of the House and of the hon. Member if I lay it in the form of a Return upon the Table of the House.

Illegal Flogging of Chinese Coolies.

Sir J. JARDINE (Roxburghshire): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will make inquiry as to the approximate number of Chinese coolies in the gold mines of the Transvaal who have been illegally flogged, under the sanction given by Lord Milner when High Commissioner; whether that sanction conferred a licence to flog on certain specified mine managers only, or on mine managers generally; and whether he can state the manner in which the terms of the sanction were communicated to the mine managers.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I am making inquiry as to the numbers involved. Lord Selborne informed Mr. Lyttelton in November last that he found it extremely difficult to ascertain when and to whom sanction for slight corporal punishment was given by Mr. Evans; that it appeared that sanction was verbally given to Major Bagot of the Labour Importation Agency and certain other individuals, but that there were no written records in the Chamber of Mines Labour Importation Agency or Foreign Labour Department; that the first authority seems to have been given in respect to a quarrel by coolies at Geduld Mine in August or September, 1904, and from time to time to certain individuals but always verbally.

Transvaal Taxation Returns.

Mr. WALROND (Devonshire, Tiverton): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what have been the total annual receipts of the revenue of the Transvaal from taxation on gold and diamond mines during the last four years.

Mr. CHURCHILL: The mining revenue of the Transvaal was as follows:—The financial year is from June to June.

Of this last sum £75,000 was from diamond mines. Another sum of £75,000 from diamond mines was received by the Government during the half year and reserved for redemption of loans.

Sir GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): Does that amount include the sum accruing from the Premier Diamond Company?

Mr. CHURCHILL: Yes, Sir. May I add that I have directed that in future a copy of the Answer shall always be supplied to the hon. Member who asks a Question.

India's Contribution to the Imperial Institute.

Mr. LAIDLAW (Renfrewshire, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India what is the total amount to date contributed to the Imperial Institute out of Indian Revenues; and if he will state for what purposes it has been allotted.

The UNDER-SECRETARY of STATE for INDIA (Mr. John Ellis, Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): The total sum expended from Indian Revenues to date for the Imperial Institute is £24,077. Of this £9,731 went for the general purposes of the Institute, £1,450 to scientific research into Indian products, and £12,896 for salaries and maintenance charges of galleries and collections of the Indian section. A further £666 or thereabouts has been spent by the Indian Government in India for raw material collections sent to the Institute. £3,300 has also been spent in India on raw product collections, some of which have been transferred to the Institute. A saving of £400 per annum has been effected at the Indian Office in consequence of the establishment of the Indian section at the Imperial Institute.

India Office and the Imperial Institute.

MR. LAIDLAW: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether a decision has been arrived at on the subject of the financial arrangements between the India Office and the Imperial Institute; whether he will state the terms of the revised arrangements; and whether he will grant a Return of all correspondence between the India Office, the Government of India, and the Imperial Institute on the subject of the Indian contribution.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: It has been decided to continue for another year the financial arrangements sanctioned for the quinquennial period ending 31st March, 1906; and I am in correspondence with the Government of India as to the revision of these arrangements. Correspondence regarding the Indian contribution was presented to Parliament in 1896, and subsequent correspondence on the subject has been included in the annual Reports on the Indian section, which are also presented. Pending a decision as to a revision of the present arrangements, I do not think it would be convenient to publish further Papers.

Indian Officials and Directorships of Companies.

SIR J. JARDINE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether members of the Council of India are allowed, after appointment, to accept directorships in public companies; and whether subordinate officials at the India Office are allowed to do the same.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: Members of the Council of India stand upon a footing totally different from that of ordinary members of the Civil Service; they cannot be removed from office except upon an Address from both Houses of Parliament; and no person has over them the control implied by the terms of the Question. As regards members of the establishment of the Secretary of State for India, they are subject, in respect of the acceptance of directorships to the same rules and restrictions as the rest of the Civil Service in this country; that is to say, they are not allowed to accept any such post if it would require their attendance at any time between the hours of ten a.m. and six p.m.

Life Saving Apparatus in Mines.

MR. T. RICHARDS (Monmouthshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has taken any steps to ascertain the extent to which the apparatus used by the German workmen at the Courrières collieries, France, have proved successful in exploration and rescue work after the explosion.

The following Questions also appeared on the Paper:—

MR. LEA: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the advent at Courrières, in France, where the recent colliery disaster took place, of a life-saving corps of Westphalian colliers equipped with the oxygen-breathing apparatus with which all German collieries are provided; and will he say whether collieries in Great Britain are provided with this life-saving system in case of explosions taking place; and, if not, what steps does he propose to take to see that these methods of life-saving are made compulsory.

MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith Burghs): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the organisation of the Westphalian Miners Salvage Corps, with a view to ascertain whether some similar system to cope with mining disasters is applicable to the requirements of British coalfields.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): The question of the provision of life-saving apparatus, and generally of facilitating the work of rescue in the case of accidents in mines, has engaged the attention of the Department for some time, and I have decided to include it among the subjects to be referred to the Royal Commission on mining which will shortly be appointed. The experience of the German rescue corps at Courrières will, no doubt, afford valuable information, and I am taking steps to obtain a Report on this and other points connected with the disaster.

Welsh Collieries—Inspection by Workmen.

Monmouthshire I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether His Majesty's chief inspector of mines for the South Wales district has sent him any Report upon the action of the manager of the Ocean Colliery Company's western pit, and the manager of the North's Navigation Colliery Company's Wyndham pit, in refusing permission to the workmen to inspect the collieries, as provided for by general Rule 38 of The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887; and if he will issue instructions to these managers to allow the inspection to take place at once.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I have received a Report from the inspector of mines on the matter, from which I gather that the difficulties have arisen in consequence of the appointment as examiners under general Rule 38 of men employed at other collieries. In the case of the Wyndham pit, the manager, I understand, acknowledges the right of the men to make such an appointment, but asks for some proof, by a reference or otherwise, that the strangers who are brought on to the mine premises to examine the mine are "practical working miners" as required by the Act. This seems to me not unreasonable. In the other case the colliery company demur to the appointment of strangers at all. It is clear, however, that the men employed at the colliery have the right under the Act to make such an appointment, and I am instructing the inspector to inform the company that in the event of such an appointment being made by the men employed at the colliery, the facilities required by the Act must be given.

Mr. BRACE: Will care be taken that practical working miners are appointed?

Mr. GLADSTONE asked for notice of any further Questions.

Essex Quarter Sessions—Case of W. H. Cheesewright.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that William Henry Cheesewright was committed for trial to the Essex Quarter Sessions on April 4th, as an incorrigible rogue and vagabond, and that the Bench directed him to be kept to hard labour in the interval; and will he say under what statute the Bench has powers to direct prisoners on remand to be put to hard labour.

Mr. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member has been misinformed. William Henry Cheesewright has not been committed for trial—he was convicted by the magistrate of being an incorrigible rogue, and committed to Quarter Sessions not for trial, but for sentence. He was ordered while waiting sentence to be kept to hard labour. This is the ordinary procedure for dealing with incorrigible rogues under Sections 5 and 10 of the Vagrancy Act.

Dangerous Exhibitions by Women.

Mr. LEA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a case tried before Mr. Justice Darling on the 13th instant; and if he will consider the advisability of issuing regulations prohibiting performances in public that may entail danger to the lives or limbs of the performers.

Mr. THOMPSON (Somersetshire, E.): I beg also to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of Stamirowski v. Barber, tried on 13th March before Mr. Justice Darling and a common jury; whether the police have power to prevent such dangerous exhibitions; and, if not, whether he will bring in a Bill to extend the Children's Dangerous Performances Acts, 1874 and 1897, to adults.

Mr. GLADSTONE: My attention has been called to the case referred to, but as it appears that the performer was over eighteen years of age (the present statutory limit for women taking part in such performances) the police could not interfere. I regret to say that I have no power to issue regulations prohibiting performances such as this, but I will consider whether it is desirable to extend the provisions of the Dangerous Performances Acts 1879 and 1897 to dangerous performances by women of any age.

London Cabmen's Complaints against the Police.

Mr. LEA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to complaints of London cabmen that they are harassed by certain constables of the Metropolitan Police, and that in these cases the constables have continually summoned the cabmen; and whether he will issue a Return showing the average number of summonses from the City Police with regard to cabmen, as compared with those for which the Metropolitan Police are responsible.

MR. GLADSTONE: I find, on inquiry, that certain verbal complaints have been made to the Commissioner of Police with regard to one district, and that he has investigated these complaints and finds they are not well founded. The constables do not summon cabmen, but report to their superintendents, who have to obtain the Commissioner's sanction before summoning. Drivers are seldom summoned for a first offence unless it is of a serious character. The circumstances of the City and the Metropolitan Police are so diverse that I do not think any useful purpose would be served by the Return suggested.

Infringements of the Hackney Carriage Regulations.

MR. LEA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in the case of complaints in reference to Hackney carriages, a record is kept of each constable appearing in support of a summons for which he is responsible, and the result of such summons.

MR. GLADSTONE: The reports made to the Commissioner show the names of the officers who report offences and the results of the proceedings if any are taken; but there is no special record of the names of officers who report offences against the Hackney Carriage Acts.

Employment of Children Act.

MR. H. J. TENNANT (Berwickshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will state which are the local authorities who have made by-laws under the Employment of Children Act; in which cases do the by-laws so made prohibit street trading by girls under sixteen; in which cases have by-laws, prohibiting such trading, been proposed and failed to secure Home Office sanction; and what is the proportion of local authorities who have taken action to those who have not taken action.

MR. GLADSTONE: Seventy-four local authorities, out of a total of 329 have submitted by-laws under this Act, usually in draft. Forty-four sets have been actually confirmed; seven others provisionally approved; one, the London set, has been made the subject of a formal inquiry; four, recently submitted, are under the consideration of the Home Office; one has been withdrawn, and the remainder are waiting for replies from the local authorities to the Home Office inquiries. I can give my hon. friend the names, if he desires them, privately. Of the fifty-one sets confirmed or provisionally approved, twenty-one entirely prohibit street trading by girls under sixteen, subject to the usual proviso for girls assisting their parents. In other cases, local authorities have fixed a lower age, or prohibited employment at certain specified places, such as the entrances of theatres, railway stations, and the like, in others a system of licensing only has been adopted. In no case has the Home Office yet refused to sanction such prohibitions.

Courrières Colliery Disaster.

MR. BRACE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether in view of the collieries explosion at the Courrières collieries, France, he will arrange with the French Government, or otherwise, for a British mining expert or experts to make an investigation, and report whether the whole, or how many of the Courrières collieries, were worked through to adjoining pits, and had a connecting road with each other; if the Courrières collieries had connecting roads with each other, to what extent, in their opinion, had that system of working contributed to the disaster; and, in view of the fact that a number of collieries in the United Kingdom are worked through to adjoining pits, and have connecting roads between pit and pit, what precautionary measures, if any, they would, as a result of their investigation, recommend.

MR. GLADSTONE: The question raised by my hon. friend is a very important one. I am in communication with the Foreign Office on the subject and I will let him know the result without delay.

The Aliens Act.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether there is any truth in the report which has been current during the last few days that certain Russians who were sent back from this country were shot when they got back to Russia.

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no confirmation of that at all.

Drainage and Sewer Rates.

MR. BROOKE (Tower Hamlets, Bow and Bromley): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the charges upon local rates, consequent upon the decisions of the Law Courts in reference to combined drainage and sewers; and whether he proposes to introduce legislation to relieve ratepayers of the burdens arising from such decisions.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): My attention has been called to this subject. It is one of considerable difficulty, and I am not in a position to make any promise with regard to legislation upon it this session.

Insanitary Houses at Bromley.

MR. BROOKE: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the insanitary condition of the property between Bow Road and High Street, Bromley, E.; and whether, in view of the fact that the London County Council is seeking powers to erect an electric car shed adjoining Bow Road, he will confer with the London County Council as to the propriety of their selecting this site and dealing with it under the Housing of the Working Classes Acts.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I am aware of the circumstances relating to the property referred to. I have communicated with the County Council, and I am informed that they have considered the question of using some portion of this property for the erection of a car shed, but they have come to the conclusion that the site would be unsuitable for the purpose.

Poor Law Relief Administration in Poplar.

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will consider the advisability of holding in public the inquiry into the administration of relief in Poplar, so that the evidence may be sifted in the public interest; and whether he proposes to carry on these investigations through officials who have already expressed opinions on the matter, or will some independent person be sent down.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I have received an application from the guardians of the Poplar Union for a public inquiry, and I have replied that I think this proposal should stand over for the present. The investigation at Poplar is being conducted by Mr. Davy, the Chief General Inspector of the Local Government Board, in whose impartiality I have entire confidence. He will receive the help of any other officers of the Department whose services may be necessary. The guardians have already intimated their willingness to render him assistance.

MR. CROOKS: Mr. Davy has already expressed opinions on the work of the guardians. Is he a proper person to conduct an investigation of this character?

MR. JOHN BURNS: Lots of persons have made ex parte statements on this particular subject.

MR. CROOKS: They are not public officials. It is a different thing altogether.

Lambeth Farm Colony.

MR. CLAUDE HAY: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will receive the deputation from the Lambeth Board of Guardians with regard to his statement that the land for the purchase of which the guardians have sought the sanction of the Local Government Board, in order to establish a farm colony, is sour land which land agents and others have attempted to palm off on innocent town boards of guardians.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I have not had any application from the Lambeth Board of Guardians to receive a deputation with regard to the statement referred to.

They have, however, asked the Local Government Board to receive a Deputation to confer with the Board on the question of providing further accommodation for the indoor poor of the parish, and I am in communication with them on the subject.

National Vaccine Establishment—Lymph Supply.

*Sir W. J. COLLINS (St. Pancras, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will state what are the original sources of the lymph supplied from the National Vaccine Establishment; and whether any of the lymph supplied from that establishment has been derived directly or indirectly from the artificial inoculation of calves with human small pox.

Mr. JOHN BURNS: The lymph supplied from the National Vaccine Establishment is in all cases derived direct from the calf, has been passed through a series of calves, and is in no instance directly derived from the artificial inoculation of calves with human smallpox. The usual method of renewing lymph for supply from the establishment is by vaccinating calves with vaccine lymph obtained from children, but it cannot be stated that this is always so.

*Sir W. J. COLLINS: Does that Answer apply to all lymphs used?

Mr. JOHN BURNS: As far as my knowledge goes, yes.

Halfpenny Post Regulations.

Mr. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that the halfpenny post regulations which apply to receipts do not provide for the same if the receipt contains any other written matter, such as soliciting the favour of further orders; will he say if these regulations are universally observed; and, if not, will he have this restriction removed.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. Sydney Buxton, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The regulations of the Halfpenny Packet Post (which are given at page 11 of the Post Office Guide) allow formulas of a conventional character in general use in commercial transactions to be written on receipts, provided that they are expressed in not more than five words. A phrase such as that to which the hon Member refers, if limited as required by the regulations, would be allowed under this rule to be written on a receipt.

Return of Postal Telegraph and Telephone Offices.

Mr. LEIF JONES (Westmoreland, Appleby): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he will grant a Return of the Post offices, telegraph offices, and public telephone call offices, which are situated on licensed premises in England, Scotland, Ireland, and Wales respectively.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: I will give instructions for the Return to be prepared. This will take some little time.

Coast Erosion

Mr. STANLEY WILSON (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the destruction caused to the coast and the townships of the East Riding of Yorkshire by the recent high tides and gales, and to the fact that the village of Kilnsea has been practically devastated by the sea; and whether His Majesty's Government can see their way to give some assistance towards repairing the damage done.

* The SECRETARY to the BOARD of TRADE (Mr. Kearley, Devonport): The Board of Trade have received information of the flooding of the lowlands at Kilnsea and Easington during the recent gales and exceptionally high tides —the highest for very many years. From this it appears that the sea washed over the tops of the embankments on both the seaward and riverward sides. From the reports made to the Board by the local inspector in charge of the groynes and other sea defences of Spurn Point, no fresh breach has been made in the embankments. A breach in the banks to the south of Kilnsea Beacon was made on September 30th last. The landowners concerned and the Commissioners of Sewers then intimated to the Board of Trade that the lands, which would be consequently flooded at Spring and high tides, were not worth the cost of protection. In 1903 the Government offered to contribute £400 towards the construction of a bank which the Commissioners of Sewers proposed at that time to make, as it was considered that this proposed bank would assist in protecting the road to the Spurn Point works and Coast Guard station. The landowners and the Commissioners of Sewers have, so far, not proceeded with these defence works; consequently the offer has not been accepted, but it still holds good. The hon. Gentleman is no doubt aware that the entire question of coast protection is about to be considered by a Royal Commission.

MR. STANLEY WILSON: Does the right hon. Gentleman realise that this is a question of the utmost urgency, and that unless the Government takes some action immediately, the village of Kilnsea, with 1,200 acres of land, must inevitably disappear into the sea?

*MR. KEARLEY: I am aware that the matter is of extreme urgency. The Government offered £400 towards the embankment, and the offer was not accepted. I am certain, however, that the Royal Commission will deal with the question.

British Interests in Argentine Railways.

MR. HOUSTON (Liverpool, West Toxteth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the capital invested in railways in the Argentine Republic, owned exclusively, or almost exclusively, by British shareholders (the companies being registered, and having their head offices in England, and their directors resident in London), amounts to about 120 millions sterling; whether he is aware that large quantities of railway material and stores have recently been ordered, and are being ordered, for extensions and renewals by the various railway companies; and whether he can state if any, and what quantities of this material are being purchased and manufactured in countries other than Great Britain.

MR. KEARLEY: I am aware that the capital invested in Argentine railways amounts to about the sum stated, and that the railway companies are largely British. Also that extensive orders are being given by the companies for the supply of stores and materials here and elsewhere; but I am unable to state what quantities are being purchased or manufactured in foreign countries.

MR. HOUSTON: Will the hon. Gentleman make it his business to find out?

MR. KEARLEY: I will inquire as far as I can.

German Bounties on Locomotives.

MR. HOUSTON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state the bounty or bonus paid to German manufacturers by the German Government on locomotives made in Germany for exportation to foreign countries; and what sum it would represent on a locomotive of eighty tons weight.

MR. KEARLEY: In answer to this and a Question addressed to the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs by the hon. Member,† I may say that certain information has reached the Foreign Office to the effect stated, but that on inquiry at Berlin we are assured that no bounty is given by the German Government on the export of locomotives.

MR. HOUSTON: My information is to the contrary.

Accidents on the District Railway.

MR. T. DAVIES (Fulham): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been drawn to the number of accidents which have occurred on the District Railway since its electrification; and whether, in view of the number of hours which the men have to work, and the want of a second man in the motorman's cab, he will take steps to insure the safety of the public who travel on that railway.

MR. KEARLEY: I am aware that a certain number of accidents have occurred to trains on the Metropolitan District

† MR. HOUSTON: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if his Department has received a Report from the English Consul at Rome giving information as to inquiries which the Italian Government were making in various countries for a number of locomotives, the conditions under which the various manufacturers were tendering, and the assistance which the German Government was giving to German makers to enable them to compete with English makers; and if he will state what that assistance is.

Railway since its equipment for electrical working. The responsibility for the safe working of the line rests with the railway company, and I am communicating with them as to the frequency of these breakdowns. No complaint has been received by the Board of Trade from any of the men employed on the railway as to the hours of work. I am advised that there is no reason to suppose that the employment of one man only in the motor cab of a train is a source of danger, or that any accident which has happened would have been avoided by the presence of a second man.

MR. WARDLE (Stockport): Is the hon. Gentleman aware that these men cannot make complaints with regard to hours because they have split turns ?

MR. KEARLEY: The men have only to make their complaint to the Board of Trade and an investigation will follow. The men have not complained, and the Board are not in a position therefore to make an inquiry.

Cost of Feeding Poor Children in London Schools.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether, in view of the Report of the Inter-Departmental Committee on medical inspection and feeding of children attending public elementary schools, which shows that the cost of food alone for a child's meal varies from 1d. to 2d., he can say what would be the annual cost of providing one meal per day for all children attending public elementary schools in the administrative county of London, and to what rate on London property this sum would be equivalent.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): The cost of the food for giving a meal to every child in public elementary schools in London on every occasion when the school is open would be, at 1d. per child, about £596,000, which is equivalent to the rate of 3½d. in the pound; if the food cost 2d. per head, the figures will be £1,192,000, equivalent to a 7d. rate. These figures take no account of the heavy expenditure on the provision and serving of the meals, including, not improbably, special buildings. Of this expenditure I can give no estimate.

Hay Crops in Lancashire and Westmoreland.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether his attention has been called to the fact that the estimated average yield, per acre, of hay from permanent grass, in the north-western counties of Lancaster and Westmoreland, is more than double that of some other English counties, and 50 per cent. above the average yield of all English counties; whether the crop is estimated in the same manner and the aftermath excluded in all cases; and, if so, whether the higher yield in the north-western districts is due to a different system of farming or heavier rainfall.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL, Yorkshire, Cleveland) (for Sir Edward Strachey): The average yield per acre of hay in Lancashire and Westmoreland is, as my hon. friend points out, very much heavier than in other parts of the country, and we are advised that this is mainly due to a larger and more equable rainfall. It is probable, however, that the comparative absence of stiff clays and poor sands in the north-western counties and the configuration of the surface of the country are also contributory causes. The estimates of crops are collected on the same system all over Great Britain, and the estimators are expressly instructed to take second crops of hay into account.

Irish Cattle Imports.

MR. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether there are any restrictions against the entry into Ireland from Great Britain of live cattle, as store cattle, and as pure-bred cattle for breeding purposes; if so, what is the nature of these restrictions; and whether there are any corresponding restrictions against the introduction from Ireland of live cattle for either of these purposes into the inland markets of Great Britain.

Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL (for Sir Edward Strachey): The importation of cattle from Great Britain into Ireland is governed by the Importation of Animals (Ireland) Order of 1900, which provides that cattle cannot be landed in Ireland except with the consent of the Irish Department of Agriculture and subject to such conditions as they may prescribe. There are no restrictions on the importation of cattle from Ireland into Great Britain.

Cattle Exports to Argentina.

Mr. CROMBIE: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether, in recent years, a large number of our best breeding cattle are being exported to Argentina and other countries competing with us in the meat trade; whether the cattle so exported have passed a tuberculine test before leaving this country; and whether those that have failed to pass this test and been rejected are permitted to be disposed of for purposes of breeding and slaughter at home.

Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL (for Sir Edward Strachey): There is a considerable export trade in breeding cattle from this country to Argentina, but the cattle are not required to pass the tuberculine test before leaving these shores. The regulations of the Argentine Government require that all imported cattle should be tested with tuberculine at the conclusion of a period of forty days quarantine after landing, and that any animals giving a diagnostic reaction shall be slaughtered. Under no circumstances can cattle exported to Argentina be brought back to this country.

Cavan Pig Exports.

Mr. VINCENT KENNEDY: I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, if he will state why the quarantine on pigs exported from Cavan, the chief pig-rearing county in Ireland, to Scotland should be continued, there being no disease existing in Cavan; and, in view of the loss to the farmers of the county consequent upon this quarantine, will he, if there be any doubt about the existence of disease, direct that a declaration by the farmer selling and the dealer buying, that there is no existing disease, be accepted in lieu of quarantine, and thus protect this industry.

Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL (for Sir Edward Strachey): In view of the fact that there are no restrictions on the movement of swine from one part of Ireland to another, it is necessary to treat the country as a whole, and we cannot grant preferential treatment to any particular county. The regulations governing the importation of swine into Great Britain have, however, recently been modified so as to admit of the introduction of store pigs under certain conditions, and they are now practically identical with those which regulate the movement of swine from one district to another in this country. My hon. friend regrets that he is unable to promise any further relaxation under existing conditions.

Cornish Mackerel Fishery—Suggested Close Time.

Mr. CORY (Cornwall, St. Ives): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he will consider the possibility of ordering a close time of Saturday and Sunday nights in the mackerel fishery in Cornwall, to relieve the glut caused by the fishing of the East Coast men on those nights, when they fish the West of England mackerel fishery, contrary to the practice of the Cornish fisherman and in opposition to public feeling, and contrary to what the East Coast fishermen do when they fish in other parts of the British Isles.

Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL (for Sir Edward Strachey): The difficulty to which my hon. friend refers is one which has on several occasions been brought under our notice, and my hon. friend should be glad to confer personally with him respecting it. We have, however, no power to adopt the particular suggestion which he makes as to the prescription of a close time for the week-end.

Mr. CORY: Will the Government or the Board of Agriculture constitute a Fishery Board for Cornwall with power to make by-laws?

Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL: No doubt that is one of the subjects on which my hon. friend would confer with the hon. Member.

Firth of Clyde Herring Fishery.

Mr. LAMONT: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland when the Fishery Board for Scotland expect to conclude their investigations into the causes of the failure, for the last three years, of the herring fishery in the Firth of Clyde; and whether a Report will be issued embodying the resulting recommendations, if any.

The SECRETARY for SCOTLAND (Mr. Sinclair, Forfarshire): The herring fishing in 1903 was above the average. No special report is contemplated. The investigations in regard to the migration of herrings in the Clyde area are being conducted by the scientific department of the Fishery Board, and a report of their work is included in the Annual Report.

Scottish Fishermen's House Agreements.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (Elgin Burghs): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been called to the conditions under which numbers of fishermen's houses are held, the fishermen having themselves built the dwellings and being liable to be evicted without compensation; and whether there is any prospect of this subject being dealt with in the forthcoming Land Bill for Scotland.

Mr. SINCLAIR: My attention has not been called to the matter referred to by the hon. Member, but I shall be prepared to consider any representations that may be made to me.

Motor Car Service for Ireland.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can say in what position the proposed motor car service in the rural districts of Ireland now is; and whether he will say if this scheme can be carried out, in view of the use which might be made of it to bring fish and other products to market.

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Bryce, Aberdeen, S.): I presume the hon. Member refers to a scheme for motor-car services in Ireland which was proposed some three years ago by Lord Iveagh and Mr. Pirrie. His Majesty's present Government have had no part in the matter, but it may be desirable that I should state briefly, for the information of the House, what appears to have taken place while the late Government were in office. I gather that the late Government gave their cordial support to the scheme, and did everything in their power to bring about co-operation between the promoters and the county councils in giving effect to the scheme. The promoters provisionally selected seventeen routes for motor car services, and these were surveyed at the instance of the Government. It was a condition of the original scheme that the roads should be put into a state to bear the heavy motor traffic, the combined weight of motor and trailer being 5½ tons. The county councils generally, while approving of the experimental service, declined to incur the expenditure necessary for putting the roads into proper condition, though the Local Government Board expressed its willingness to make loans for the purpose. I am informed that Lord Iveagh and Mr. Pirrie eventually announced that they would give the county councils a year to consider what could be done, but intimated that the scheme must be dealt with as a whole, and that they were not prepared to set it on foot in those localities only in which its prospects of success were least favourable. It is a matter of regret to find that the year allowed for consideration has passed, and that nothing further appears to have been done by the county councils. His Majesty's present Government would gladly do everything that might be possible to further the philanthropic scheme proposed by these gentlemen if its revival should in any way be brought about; but the question of re-opening negotiations with Lord Iveagh and Mr. Pirrie is obviously one for the county councils to consider.

Captain DONELAN (Cork, E.): When this scheme was first started, was any condition as to improving the roads attached to it?

Mr. BRYCE: I take it that as soon as the scheme took a tangible form, it was found necessary to ask county councils to put the roads in a proper condition.

Lord Westmeath's Galway Estates.

MR. JOHN ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners will inquire before sanctioning the purchase price agreed on, between Lord Westmeath and his county Galway tenants, into the circumstances which led to the existing litigation between the landlord and sub-agent Moran; whether the amount claimed by the landlord in the writ against Moran is alleged to represent rent collected by Moran from the tenants; if so, will care be taken to prevent what Lord Westmeath treats as collected arrears, in one proceeding, from being included in the purchase bargain with the tenants; and whether the rent receipts given to the tenants in recent years will be examined by the Commissioners, and the tenants brought up before the Commissioners to ascertain the circumstances in which they were given.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that no proceedings for the sale of this estate have been instituted before them, and that they have, therefore, no knowledge of the facts alleged in the Question. If the estate should come before the Commissioners, they will make due inquiries, in accordance with the Act and with the Regulations made thereunder.

Lisard Estate, County Galway.

MR. JOHN ROCHE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that it is the desire of the small tenants at Kilconnell, county Galway, that the Congested Districts Board should hand over the Lisard estate to the Estates Commissioners in order that it may be divided amongst them; and whether he will instruct the Congested Districts Board to do so.

MR. BRYCE: A Resolution to the effect stated in the Question has been received by the Congested Districts Board. The Lisard estate, which is not situate in a congested district, was purchased by the Board for the benefit of congested districts in county Galway. The Resolution in question will be considered by the Board at their next meeting; but in the meantime I may refer the hon. Member to my reply to the Question of the hon. Member for North Roscommon on Monday last†, in which the powers and policy of the Board in regard to the disposal of lands purchased for the purposes of migration are fully stated.

Marquess of Clanricarde and the United Irish League.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the action of the Marquess of Clanricarde in instituting eviction proceedings against Mr. Martin Ward, merchant, of Loughrea, for the recovery of his business house and premises, because he acts as secretary of the Loughrea branch of the United League; and whether, in the interest of the peace and good order of the district, he will introduce legislation this year with a view of putting a stop to proceedings of this kind.

MR. BRYCE: It is, I understand, the fact that eviction proceedings against Mr. Ward are pending at the suit of the Marquess of Clanricarde. Men's motives are matter for conjecture, and I cannot undertake to state what they were in this case; nor can I make any statement as to possible legislation on the subject of town tenancies.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): On the question of motive, is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Lord Clanricarde's agent wrote a letter, which has been published, in which he gives as a reason for the eviction of this gentleman the fact that he is secretary to the local branch of the United Irish League.

MR. BRYCE: I have not heard that.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: I will send the right hon. Gentleman a copy of the letter.

Goodbody Estate, Galway—Case of Christopher Kennedy.

MR. DUFFY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of

Ireland whether he is aware that an evicted tenant named Christopher Kennedy, with three sons, aged respectively twenty-seven, twenty-four, and twenty, applied for a holding on the Goodbody estate; and whether, seeing that Kennedy was in possession of his old home for over forty years, until dispossessed by the Agricultural Board, in order to take up possession, the Commissioners will give immediate consideration to Kennedy's application for a holding before it is all distributed amongst the large land proprietors in the neigbourhood.

Mr. BRYCE: I am informed that Kennedy was not a tenant on the Goodbody estate, but was employed on the estate as a herd. The question of providing Kennedy with a certain portion of the land which would be suitable for his present business of a butcher is at present under the consideration of the Department of Agriculture and the Estates Commissioners.

Athenry Agricultural Farm—Purchases of Machinery.

Mr. DUFFY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Board of Agriculture in Ireland is responsible for the purchasing of foreign machinery for use on the agricultural farm near Athenry; and whether, seeing that similar pieces of machinery can be purchased from people who manufacture the same class of material at home, he will take steps, price and quality being equal, to see that encouragement is given to home-manufactured goods.

Mr. BRYCE: The instructions issued by the Department of Agriculture to the superintendent of their agricultural station at Athenry are to obtain quotations for machinery of Irish manufacture, and, price and quality being equal, to purchase the same in preference to goods manufactured elsewhere. As, however, the station serves as an educational establishment, the superintendent is at the same time instructed to avoid a sameness in the type of implements used, and to procure specimens of new types of machinery or implements designed for special purposes. Several of the implements used on the Athenry farm were bought by the Department with the estate.

Irish Courthouses—Clare County Council Resolution.

Mr. HALPIN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he received a resolution from the Clare County Council calling on the Government to have the management of the various courthouses in the county vested in the county council, who are responsible for their rent and repairs, and find it difficult to deal with them in the absence of any control; and will he say what action he will take in the matter.

Mr. BRYCE: I have received the Resolution referred to. Legislation would be necessary to effect the change suggested, and the matter would require to be very carefully considered. I am not at present prepared to make any statement on the subject.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the advisability of introducing legislation, in view of the hardship inflicted on the county council, by making them pay for the courthouses while giving them no control over them.

Mr. BRYCE: I will consider it, but I must not be taken to give any promise.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND: If I bring in a Bill, will the Government give me facilities for it?

Donemana Protestant Flute Band.

Mr. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that at Donemana, North Tyrone, on Saturday night, March 10th, the Protestant Flute Band, while on parade, were attacked by Nationalists, who threw stones and other missiles at the bandsmen, and what steps are being taken by the police to put a stop to mob interference with peaceably disposed people and the destruction of property in this district.

Mr. BRYCE: The police are doing everything which may be possible to preserve the peace at Donemana, where, unfortunately, Party feeling has recently become excited. The information which

I have received does not agree with the allegations in the Question, but as proceedings are being taken against certain persons in connection with the disturbance of the 10th inst., it is better not to make any statement while the matter is sub judice.

Longworth Oatfield Newcastle Estate, Galway.

Mr. JOHN ROCHE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a petition from the tenants in the neighbourhood of the Longworth Oatfield Newcastle estate, in the county of Galway, requesting that the Land purchased by the Congested Districts Board should be divided amongst those of them who at present live upon uneconomic holdings; and whether their request will be granted with as little delay as possible.

Mr. BRYCE: The petition in question has been received by the Congested Districts Board, and will be considered by them at their next meeting.

Shooting Outrage at Gurteenreery, County Tipperary.

Mr. KENDAL O'BRIEN (Tipperary, Mid.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the result of the Constabulary inquiries into the statements of Thomas Pratt and his wife that they were fired at twice at Gurteenreery, Kilcooley, county Tipperary, on the 17th Februrary; have Pratt and his man, William O'Keeffe, firearms in the shape of revolvers and guns; could the marks on the walls of the old dwelling-house have been caused by shots fired at Pratt or his man; and, having regard to the peaceable state of the district and the doubtful character of this alleged outrage, will he order that these men be deprived immediately of the firearms which they possess.

Mr. BRYCE: The circumstances of the alleged firing at Mr. and Mrs. Pratt will be stated in my reply to the next Question. The local police are of opinion that the case was a genuine one and not bogus. Mr. Pratt possesses a gun and a revolver, for both of which he is duly licensed under the Peace Preservation Act; but, so far as the police are aware, O'Keeffe has no firearms. On the day after the alleged firing, the police examined Pratt's gun and formed the decided opinion that it had not been fired for a considerable time. In these circumstances, no sufficient reason for the revocation of Pratt's arms licence appears to exist.

Mr. KENDAL O'BRIEN: I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will explain the circumstances under which an evicted tenant named Philip M'Donnell, from near Kilcooley, county Tipperary, was arrested on February 18th and committed to Clonmel gaol; is he aware that he was subsequently brought up on remand, after spending eight days in prison, before Mr. Turner, R.M., at Clonmel petty sessions, and that Mr. Turner refused the remand, on the ground that no evidence was produced to sustain the charge then entered against him of having fired two shots at Thomas and Mary Ellen Pratt; that, notwithstanding the refusal of the remand and his consequent release from custody, he was immediately re-arrested and brought back to Killenaule under arrest, and that depositions were then taken from Pratt and his wife, who are there in possession of the farm from which M'Donnell was evicted; and whether, seeing that the case was finally brought before two magistrates, Mr. R. Hemphill and Mr. R. Ashby, at Killenaule, and dismissed on the grounds that there was not a particle of evidence to support it, he propose to take any steps to compensate M'Donnell for the imprisonment suffered by him and the annoyance he was put to.

Mr. BRYCE: Mr. and Mrs. Pratt reported to the police that at 7.30 on the evening of February 17th two gun shots were fired at them as they were crossing the yard of their residence, but they both escaped injury. The police on examining the place found that several pellets of shot had struck a wall and a cart in the yard. On February 19th, Philip M'Donnell was arrested upon suspicion, and was remanded in custody for a week. M'Donnell is the son of a tenant who, twenty-four years ago, was evicted from the farm which Pratt now holds. The police had not completed their investigation of the case by the expiration of the remand, and they therefore applied for a further remand, but this was refused by the magistrates, upon the ground that no evidence to justify it had been produced. The police thereupon re-arrested the accused, and on the following day Mr. and Mrs. Pratt gave sworn evidence that they had been fired at, and the accused was further remanded in custody for a week. Upon the expiration of this remand, the accused was discharged, the police having failed to obtain evidence incriminating him in the offence. The Inspector-General is of opinion that the local police ought not to have re-arrested the accused in the circumstances stated, and he has so informed them, but he is satisfied that they acted in good faith. I regret that I have no power to give compensation to a person arrested on suspicion in such a case.

Adulteration of Foods and Drugs.

Mr. SAMUEL YOUNG (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether seeing that the Sale of Food and and Drugs Act only defines in general terms what constitutes adulteration, the Government will consider the advisability of appointing a permanent board of reference, to which appeals may be made for guidance and authoritative advice touching the permissible composition, and the definition and the brands which should be used in the sale of food and drinks.

The PRIME MINISTER and FIRST LORD of the TREASURY (Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, Stirling Burghs): The establishment of a board of reference that would be empowered to prescribe standards of the quality and purity of food has been more than once suggested, and, I may add, that some authority of the sort appears to me to be indispensable, if the intentions of Parliament with respect to the administration of the laws affecting adulteration are to be rendered effectual. I am advised, however, that legislation would be necessary for the purpose, and the Government see no prospect of introducing such legislation during the present session.

Land Conveyance in Scotland.

Mr. EUGENE WASON (Clackmannan and Kinross): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to a Resolution of the Town Council of Alva urging upon the Government to appoint a Commission to institute a careful and exhaustive investigation into the present system of conveying land in Scotland, the registration of writs affecting the same, and the complaints as to delay and expense which it occasions; and whether he will be prepared to appoint such a Commission.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: A number of representations, including that mentioned by my hon. friend, have been received, and the subject is now under the consideration of the Government, but I cannot as yet make any announcement as to the conclusions at which they have arrived.

American Subsidy Bill.

Sir W. EVANS GORDON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): On behalf of the hon. Member for Darlington, I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether His Majesty's Government have considered the probable effect which the Subsidy Bill, now before the American House of Representatives, will have on the shipping and ship-building industry of this country; and whether His Majesty's Government propose to take any steps in regard to it.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: His Majesty's Government are not able to say what will probably be the effect of the Subsidy Bill, in the event of its becoming law. If the Bill passes, its consequences will, of course, be carefully watched. The Government do not see that any useful action could be taken by them in the matter.

Colonial Conference.

Mr. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government that the Colonial Conference, to be held next year, will be given a free hand in the consideration of all matters of Imperial interest, fiscal or otherwise.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes, it will be open to the Conference to discuss any matter of Imperial interest.

Mr. LONSDALE: Would the right hon. Gentleman consider fiscal arrangements a matter of Imperial interest

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It depends on what is included in the term fiscal arrangements.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, Sir. Notice should be given of that Question.

Land Tax Commissioners' Names Bill.

MR. CLEMENT EDWARDS (Denbigh District): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government, in accordance with the usage prevailing up to the year 1895, to introduce a Land Tax Commissioners' Names Bill, especially in view of the long period that has elapsed since such a measure was passed into Law.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Answer is in the affirmative.

Germany and the Welsh Coalfields.

MR. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government have any information of the conclusion of negotiations for the purchase of two anthracite collieries in Wales by a German syndicate; and whether they propose to take steps to prevent the alienation of the sources of supply of a commodity essential to our naval supremacy.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, Sir. The Government have no information of the kind at their disposal. A similar Question was addressed to the late Prime Minister on more than one occasion towards the close of last session, and I can only repeat what he said on August 1st, namely, that we have no reason to believe that there is a German Syndicate in treaty for any area at all of the steam coal which is used by the Navy. With respect to the second part of the hon. Member's Question, the Admiralty are satisfied that there is no necessity for taking any steps in the matter, and in that view the Government entirely concur.

MEMBERS AND THEIR SEATS.

MR. SOARES (Devonshire, Barnstaple) called the attention of the Speaker to what he described as a daily breach of the rules of the House. He pointed out that the rules provided that a Member by placing his hat on a seat, or a card provided for the purpose, and subsequently remaining within the precincts of the House, acquired the right to that seat for the sitting. Every day Members secured a seat and then went away and did not return until prayers. He wished to know whether such conduct was not a breach of the rules of the House, and whether it came under Rule 161 and was punishable by the Speaker as "grossly disorderly conduct."

*MR. SPEAKER: It is, or ought to be by this time, the well known rule that Members who take seats before prayer time ought not to leave the House, but should remain within the precincts. I cannot say that as at present advised I should be prepared to put in force the rule mentioned by the hon. Member. I feel sure that when it is thoroughly understood that there should be an honourable understanding to that effect, hon. Members will be prepared to carry out the spirit as well as the letter of the rule.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Croydon) asked the intentions of the Government with regard to the suspension of the Twelve o'Clock Rule. In the event of the Army Estimates debate being continued till a later hour, was it proposed to take Vote 8 and Vote 10 of the Navy after twelve o'clock? He thought it would be very objectionable.

SIR. H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: We do not propose to take any Navy Votes to-night other than on Report.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. EMMOTT (Oldham) in the Chair.]

ARMY ESTIMATES, 1906-7.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £10,220,000, be granted to His Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Pay, &c., of His Majesty's Army (including Army Reserve) at Home and Abroad (exclusive of India), which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1907."

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington) said that when Vote A was about to be given on Thursday there was an understanding between himself and the right hon. Gentleman opposite the Member for Croydon, that, as there were many members of the Committee who wished to speak, they should be at liberty to discuss Army matters generally upon Vote 1, but they could only do that with the Chairman's permission. They should have obtained that permission, however, before the Vote was put. The Chairman would remember that the right hon. Gentleman and himself wished to raise the point, but it was too late. He (Mr. Haldane) therefore asked him now, on behalf of those Members who wished to speak, whether they might be at liberty to discuss matters generally on Vote 1, and not be debarred by a misunderstanding for which he was really to blame owing to a want of knowledge of technical practice. It would be a great convenience to the Committee generally, and would be carrying out the distinct understanding between himself and the right hon. Gentlemen, if the Chairman permitted that discussion of Army matters generally.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The ordinary rule is that when a continuation of the general discussion i desired on some other Vote, an arrangement for such continuation must be made during the discussion of Vote A, the consent of the Chairman not being withheld. On this occasion that has not been done. The right hon. Gentleman now informs me that the fact of its not having been done was due to a misunderstanding. Under those circumstances, I do not think I can take the responsibility of refusing a general discussion on Vote 1, but I do wish to point out that this is an important rule and must be observed as far as possible in the future. It is only because of this serious misunderstanding affecting both sides of the House that on this occasion I allow the general discussion to go on.

MR. HALDANE said he took it that there would be no desire to discuss the whole matter over again on the report stage of Vote A.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Croydon) concurred.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham) hoped he might claim the indulgence of the Committee if he made a few observations of a general nature on this Vote, in view of the fact that it was now three years since he last troubled the House with any remarks on Army questions. Although he was by no means an old Member, he had had the fortune to hear three successive Secretaries of State for War make their debuts, and on each occasion he seemed to remember that their introductory statements were received with a measure of generous acclamation from most parts of the House, praise which was not always repeated in subsequent stages of discussion. Therefore, if he might add his insignificant tribute to the many which the right hon. Gentleman had received on his statement, he should like to do so with a certain amount of caution, and to congratulate him for perhaps somewhat different reasons to those hitherto advanced. The right hon. Gentleman, in the course of the lengthy statement—it was not too lengthy—which he had made to the House, had said many wise things, but had told them very little. In this respect he had shown a remarkable restraint, even self-denial, if he might say so, for it must have been a severe strain upon any Secretary of State for War not to submit to an expectant House a complete panacea for all the ills that military flesh was heir to. The gist of the right hon. Gentleman's statement was "Leave me free." Personally, he did not raise any objection to that course. Hitherto, he understood that Secretaries of State for War had been considered fair game, but this was the first instance that he knew of on record in which the game had been able to name the close time which it should enjoy during the approaching season. The right hon. Gentleman had by his wisdom secured for himself a reasonably close time during the present session. In approaching the question of Army reform, he had wisely determined to apply this touchstone to all questions of military organisation, and indeed to all existing arrangements—whether they were directly conducive to the fighting efficiency of the Army. He did not, however, add the natural complement to that which was used in the case of the Naval service, viz., not only fighting efficiency, but instant readiness for war. That was the touchstone which had been applied in the case of the Naval service during the last few years with remarkable success, and there was no doubt it had been highly conducive to economy, which they all knew was now the question of the hour. The right hon. Gentleman had shown them that he had already made a beginning in the matter of economy, but he must draw attention to the very remarkable statement or claim put forward by the Prime Minister in the course of the debate the other night, when he claimed that the right hon. Gentleman had succeeded in reducing the Estimates of his predecessors by some £1,750,000. That was a very surprising statement; and he believed his right hon. friend the late Secretary of State for War absolutely repudiated it. It had, however, been used in the Liberal Press during the last few days, and it was used by a member of the Government speaking in the country on Saturday night. He would therefore like to put to the right hon. Gentleman this direct question: Did he claim that he had actually reduced the Estimates of the late Government by £1,750,000?

MR. HALDANE: No, Sir. Those Estimates were merely draft Estimates, as the right hon. Gentleman says. They were what may be called the military requirements put forward in the office, and I take it the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon and the late Chancellor of the Exchequer would have reviewed them. I have no doubt the right hon. Gentleman himself would have reduced them.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE said he thought the right hon. Gentleman's statement showed that the Prime Minister was under a complete misapprehension when he made that claim to the House on Thursday night.

MR. HALDANE: The Prime Minister made a statement only in reference to military requirements.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE said the Prime Minister went further than that, but the right hon. Gentleman had given a categorical denial, and he thought that was all that was necessary. The aspect of economy which animated the whole Committee expresssed itself the other night in an arbitrary attempt to reduce the Army by 10,000 men, an attempt very properly resisted by the right hon. Gentleman, because it seemed to him (the speaker) that before they could decide whether or not they could dispense with a certain number of men a little clear thinking, of which the right hon. Gentleman was such a distinguished exponent, had to be applied. They had first of all to arrive at the basic element of the problem, which was: What was the purpose for which the British Army was maintained? That was an inquiry which had often been put by the House in recent years, and had never been satisfactorily answered. An attempt was made some years ago by Mr. Edward Stanhope in a celebrated Memorandum to define the objects of the British Army, and he could not help thinking that the time had now arrived when the right hon. Gentleman or the Committee of Defence, should bring out a revised or up-to-date edition of the Stanhope Memorandum. He was fortified in that expression of opinion by certain weighty remarks made by the Prime Minister himself when Leader of the Opposition last session. He spoke in the strongest possible terms on the point. He said—

> "The right hon. Gentleman has however, after all, not contributed out of the wealth of his knowledge and argument to the point we all wish to be informed about—what are the military necessities of the country? How many men do we require? . . . What is the good of the Secretary of State for War telling us his views, which he has done with great force and fulness, with regard to the regular Army, the Militia, and the Volunteers? We have never heard what the view of the Cabinet was, and we are invited to form our opinions and to vote money and do all the other part of our duty without having the fundamental notion of what the wisest and highest authority in the country declares should be the number of men required for the defence of the country and its oversea obligations."

He was anxious to emphasise the non-party character of these discussions, and would therefore press upon the right hon. Gentleman not his own demand, but the demand put so forcibly by his own Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman's basic theory was an absolute acceptance of the extreme blue-water school. He was a member of the blue-water school himself, but he was not sure that he was able to accept its extreme conclusions quite as readily, he almost said as joyously, as the right hon. Gentleman appeared to have done. He preferred that there should be some kind of prudent insurance against the extreme risk or the hundred to one chance of a fatal accident. The right hon. Gentleman had told them, and he thought all of the blue-water school would agree, that invasion on a large scale, as long as the Navy was adequately maintained, was impossible. He went further, however, and said a raid was impossible. There was, he should say, a good deal of divergence of expert opinion on this point, and he could not help thinking that the question of a raid required a little more examination before it was finally dismissed, because in a matter of this description they had to consider not only probabilities but possibilities. The vital point of the right hon. Gentleman's whole argument, as indeed it was of the whole position of the blue-water school, was that the whole theory was fatal unless the Navy was invincible. It was not merely a question of the arithmetical proportion between the Navies of this country and any two countries as expressed in the two-Power standard, because the Empire could not stake its existence on the efficacy of arithmetic. If we should be engaged in a European war, it was more than probable that we should have to face two or more Powers at one time, because probably no less a combination would think of attempting such a venture. Therefore the only justification of the extreme blue-water theory was that our Navy must be maintained invincible, and the question was could we count on that maintenance? The air at present was full of talk of retrenchment, reduction of armaments, even disarmament. Of course, if disarmament could be carried out in mathematical proportion between the various Powers concerned, well and good, but what tribunal could there be which could in the first place determine the proportion, and, in the second place, enforce it? Let them take a practical example. Let them take the case of a possible continental enemy, a large military Power. They might agree to a reduction in the interests of peace of 100,000 men in their Army. In the first place that would be a purely illusory reduction, because it could be almost instantly replaced in a conscript country, and in any case the residual strength would be ample to overwhelm our relatively insignificant forces. In any case we could not reply to that advance by reducing our Army by 100,000 men; we should have to reply in kind, and what would probably be considered the naval equivalent? Possibly a squadron of battleships, according to whatever index number was adopted by the Hague or other Peace Conference. Such a reduction on our part would take years to replace, and it would probably just tip the balance of invincibility against us and lay us open to that fatal blow at the heart from which recovery would be impossible. Therefore he trusted we should not take a sentimental lead in the pious aspiration towards a reduction of armaments, leading up to universal peace, although he thought we should take every opportunity of responding to any actual and reasonable advances which were made by other Powers whose position in the matter was not quite so vital. We had not only a "blue-water" school to consider, but also a "milk-and-water" school, which had received a good deal of re-inforcement during the last few months. They had all read a remarkable speech by Mr. Courtney a few days ago. It would not have been so important if it had not been taken up by the Liberal Press and received an immense amount of support from hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. There was no doubt that that feeling existed, and he was all the more thankful that the right hon. Gentleman himself belonged to the "blue-water" school, and that so long as he was in office he was not likely to consent to any disarmament or reduction of armaments which would in the least imperil our invincibility upon the sea. The right hon. Gentleman had naturally dwelt, on the various occasions on which he had spoken, upon the financial aspect of the question. He had shown his practical desire to make reductions wherever possible, and he had shown with unanswerable logic that the only way to make substantial reductions was by reducing the number of men. He (the Speaker) confessed he was not able to follow all the right hon. Gentleman's conclusions upon that point. It seemed to him that the case of India was especially puzzling. The right hon. Gentleman gave them to understand that one of the substantial reductions that might be made was in the British Army in India. Where did the economy come in? The British Army in India was paid for by the Indian Government. It was true, of course, that a certain expense came upon us, but it did not come upon us from maintaining that force in India, but because we had chosen to find drafts for the force in India by a most expensive, extravagant, and inefficient method. They must not apply the question of efficiency only to the drafts; they had to consider the state of the Army at home as well, and that had been seriously injured by the system of supplying drafts through the linked battalion system, which the hon. Member for the Forest of Dean had most effectually demolished in debate, though unfortunately not in practice. The Indian Government, so far as the strength of the Indian force was concerned, paid the piper, and he therefore presumed that it was entitled to call the tune. It was not only the Russian problem they had to consider, but also the question of British prestige in connection with a handful of white men among 300,000,000 of natives of India, and they could not altogether ignore the lessons of 1857. It had also to be remembered that whilst the Army at home had been recently increased, the Army of India had remained practically at the same figure for the last fifteen years. There did not, therefore, seem the same necessity for making any attempt to reduce the force there. The economic question, however, was the one which primarily concerned the Committee. The Indian Army was expensive to us only in so far as we insisted on maintaining the system of linked battalions. The right hon. Gentleman the other day quoted in support of his defence of the linked battalion system certain authoritative opinions put forward by Lord Roberts and Sir Evelyn Wood, who had expressed the opinion that the recruits produced under the linked battalion system were superior to those produced under the depôt system. That was a matter in which he believed even the experts were by no means agreed. If, however, there was doubt as to whether the recruits produced by the linked battalion system were the better of the two, there was no doubt whatever as to which of the two systems was the more economical. He himself extracted information from the War Office some three or four years ago, which went to show that the cost of the recruit under the linked battalion system was five times that of the recruit under the marine depôts system. He did not think they could afford to be extravagant in these matters, and he was quite certain that, even if the recruit under the linked battalion system was slightly better at first, in three months after he arrived in India his superiority would be absolutely indistinguishable. He could not believe that the right hon. Gentleman could not, with the expert advice at his back, produce some alternative to this vicious and costly system of supplying recruits for foreign service. The right hon. Gentleman referred to a number of minor economies which he either proposed to introduce, or had introduced, during the course of his short term of office. On the majority of them he (Mr. Lee) had no criticisms to make, although there were two small points he felt bound to refer to in justice to the late Board of Admiralty. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman had suggested that the late Board of Admiralty wished to maintain a garrison and forts at St. Helena for the purpose of defending 5,000 tons of coal. He presumed that was meant as a jest. It was not the object at all; the object was the very reasonable one of having defences there for the purpose of denying the use of the anchorage of St. Helena to any enemy's cruisers which might use the place as a coaling rendezvous. That was a very different and a very substantial reason. The other point was with reference to Wei-hai-Wei. Various jokes had been made with regard to Wei-hai-Wei as a watering place. It was really not a joke. If the hon. Gentlemen who laughed had had the experience of spending three summer seasons at China as he had done they would know that the health of the men, not only of the Army but of the Navy, was of the utmost importance, and that there was no other place except Wei-hai-Wei which was suitable for the establishment of a sanatorium for the Fleet, and for the hospital which had now been erected for the benefit of the men of the Fleet.

MR. HALDANE: I did not object to Wei-hai-Wei being retained as a British possession; but we did object to, and what we have got rid of, was the maintenance of a Chinese Regiment at Wei-hai-Wei, which cost £20,000 a year.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE said that the right hon. Gentleman must remember that that regiment was exceedingly useful at the time of the relief of the Pekin Legations, and it might be again wanted in the case of an outbreak in China. There was one economy which the right hon. Gentleman had taken a considerable pride in, but to which he took most serious objection. The right hon. Gentleman had said he had either stopped or reduced to a large extent the military reconnaissance of possible theatres of war in these islands. How much money would be saved in this way? It must be an exceedingly small sum. He himself had been engaged in carrying out military reconnaisances on a large scale and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that they could be carried out at a very much cheaper cost than the right hon. Gentleman seemed to imagine. That was only one of the small and obvious precautions which should be taken against the 100 to one chance of invasion. It was quite certain that these reconnaissances had been made by foreign experts. The right hon. Gentleman referred with some humour to the futility of surveying the defences of Birmingham. Birmingham, it might be said, was very well able to take care of itself. It was possible to improvise earthworks, rifle-men, and scouts, but we could not improvise knowledge of the ground.

It was only that superior knowledge of the ground which would enable amateur riflemen to make a stand against trained and organised troops. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not forget what had happened in Natal and the loss we had suffered there for want of a knowledge of the country. All that was needed was a small number of staff officers to study the strategic and tactical features of the ground. He knew that was a thing which could be easily done in time of peace, but the lack of it might easily lead to disaster in time of war. The last point he wished to make, and, perhaps, it was the most serious of all, was in regard to the shortage of recruits. During the last few years the pay of the British soldier had been greatly improved, as well as his conditions of service. Why, then, this falling off in the number of recruits? Many reasons had been advanced, but there was one which had not been advanced, nor even suggested. It was that the Army had been made unpopular. There had been a conspiracy in the Press, in Parliament, and in society to discredit and ridicule the Army. There was a popular idea abroad that we had no Army to speak of and that what we had was inefficient. The truth was that our Army was considerably stronger than it was before the opening of the Boer War, and the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had admitted to the House that the Army was never so efficient as it was to-day. He was exceedingly glad that the right hon. Gentleman had publicly repudiated the most unfortunate, and altogether inexplicable, statement made by Lord Roberts which had gained such wide currency. The evil, however, had been done. The Army had been sneered at and laughed at; and both officers and men were tired of being "humbugged about." A few years ago the Army was a popular idol; to-day it was a popular butt—at any rate with certain classes. The cloud under which it had been resting naturally affected those high-spirited young men who looked upon the Army as a glorious profession in which they could engage and enjoy a life of adventure while at the same time doing service to their country. This was the class of men who had been deterred from entering the Army. We had been getting, he admitted another class who had been driven by hunger, or want of work, to enlist; but these were poor substitutes for the other classes who had been discouraged. Let the right hon. Gentleman, the Government, and the Press encourage the Army. Let them let it alone. That was what the Army really wanted for a time and then it would soon be restored, not only to popular favour, but to that confidence in itself which was of far more importance than anything else at the present time. The recruiting problem would then solve itself, because the conditions of service were excellent, though of course, not incapable of improvement, and the pay sufficient. In conclusion, he would earnestly beg the right hon. Gentleman to consider the points he had raised, and to recognise that they came from one who had the best reason for being interested in the welfare of the Army, and who had the greatest possible admiration for the fresh, broad-minded, and non-Party attitude in which the right hon. Gentleman had approached this great national problem.

MR. CHARLES HOBHOUSE (Bristol, E.) hoped he would not be charged in any way with indulging in a controversial spirit if he took some slight notice of one or two of the observations of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who had just addressed the Committee. The hon. and gallant Gentleman had said that one reason why the Army was unpopular at the present moment, and why recruits were not coming in, was that the Army had been "humbugged about." That was only a re-echo of what he himself had been saying during almost all the time the late Government remained in office. It was during that period that the Army was "humbugged about," and successive Secretaries of State for War would not let it alone. He did not wish to rake up slumbering or dead ashes; but it should be recognised how those difficulties arose When this subject came up for discussion earlier in the session, he ventured to point out to the Committee some of the difficulties connected with enlistment. Take the cavalry alone. Last year the cavalry was subjected to no less than three different systems. At the beginning of 1905 the period was three years with the Colours, and nine with the Reserve. A little later it was eight years with the Colours and four with the Reserve. At the present moment, it was seven years with the Colours and five with the Reserve. That was one of the reasons why young men would not enlist; they did not know from day to day, from week to week, or from month to month, for what term either they or their comrades were being enlisted. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would introduce a consistent policy, in regard to the distribution and numbers of the Army, and that the actual terms of enlistment would be laid down on a permanent footing. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Forest of Dean and he had been at loggerheads in this House on the subject of linked battalions. He ventured to think that the case for linked battalions had never been fully stated in Parliament since the days of Mr. Cardwell. "Linked battalions" was quite an erroneous term; it should be in reality the "double battalion system." That system was the outcome of the Cardwell territorial system and the short service system. Without these it never would have existed at all. The right hon. Gentleman had quoted the fact that the Esher Commission recommended its abolition. That was so; but many other recommendations of the same Commission had also not been adopted, while some that had been adopted had not been justified by events. The case for the double-battalion system rested partly on administrative convenience and economy, and it was also more convenient for the despatch of drafts to the battalions abroad. There was another reason which was entirely overlooked by the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down when he argued against it. At all events the hon. Gentleman had not informed the Committee of the fact that the infantry soldier was not enlisted for general service, but for a particular regiment; the consequence was that he could not be transferred, when he came up for reserve service in rejoining the Colours, to serve in any other regiment than that for which he was enlisted. The result was that if war broke out, and if the linked battalion, either in the Colonies or in India, was at its full strength there was no need for recruits or reserves. If the linked battalion system were done away with, there would be hundreds of thousands of men at home whom it would not even be possible to bring together in any military organisation, but who would be felt stranded at the depots where they could be of no service to the country at all. If, on the other hand, they had, as they had at present, this linked battalion system, what did they do with their recruit? He was at once sent, instead of to a depot, to the linked battalion at home and helped to bring up that battalion to its full strength. Then the linked battalion at home, unlike the depot, could be despatched to the scene of action as a military unit. That was the case for the linked battalion as it presented itself to Mr. Cardwell's mind, and as he thought it presented itself to the mind of the present Secretary of State for War. Although it was unquestionable whether depots by themselves when created would be slightly less costly than the linked battalion, there was not, as far as he knew, a single military officer of experience who could be found in public to adopt the course proposed by his right hon. friend the Member for the Forest of Dean and those who thought with him. On the other side there was overwhelming evidence—Commission after Commission, Committee after Committee, Report after Report—to substantiate and uphold the present system. He would not give more than one or two points in illustration of what he had said. There was, for instance, a Report by Lord Wolseley, and he noticed that nowadays Lord Wolseley's name was never quoted in this House as a military authority, and yet he was known in his day—which perhaps had rather passed—as the foremost military reformer, and to no man in this country was a greater debt of gratitude due for breaking up the obsolete system which had prevailed at the War Office. Lord Wolseley said—

> "Our internal military history for the past twenty-five years has in every way demonstrated the wisdom of those, who, in 1870, maintained that this principle is the keystone of the arch supporting the military organisation then introduced."

The keystone then referred to was the linked battalion system. Then there was the opinion of Sir Evelyn Wood, than whom there had been no more distinguished soldier in this country. His opinion was dead against that expressed by the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean. Sir

Evelyn Wood was, he thought, the first man who produced at Aldershot any military system worthy of the name, and who made Aldershot a real training ground for the Army. His system was that training was not to be received between intervals of pleasure but as the essence of military life. Sir Evelyn Wood's opinion was as explicit and as clear as it could be that to the linked battalion system we owed the military organisation and stability of the Empire. Many other authorities could be quoted, but in the face of the two great ones he had cited those opposed to the linked battalion system could not produce a single one. No one who had looked at the Recruiting Report could be altogether satisfied with it. A great many advantages were introduced into the Army during the time of Mr. Brodrick, and one great advantage was the introduction of characters. Too much stress could of course be laid on that point, but it had reduced the troubles of the district and general courts-martial to an extraordinary extent. It had reduced the "ins and outs" in the different regiments to a great extent: that was the men who enlisted, then deserted and enlisted elsewhere. But nobody could look at the figures of the men going in and the men coming out without alarm. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon put the difference of the figures at 18,000. There had been an exodus from the Army not only on account of the three years men, but on account of the eight years men, who, having served with the Colours, had gone off through the system of bounties or the prolongation of their service in India in consequence of the late war.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool) said that in common with right hon. and hon. Gentlemen in all parts of the House he listened to the speech of the Secretary of State for War with the greatest possible pleasure, especially to that part dealing with the Militia. The right hon. Gentleman was the first Minister of modern times who had recognised the great part which the Militia ought to occupy with regard to our defence, and also the part it had played long ago in the defence of our coaling stations in times of war. The right hon. Gentleman had said that he hoped the Militia would not be used as a Militia Reserve; that they should be trained under their own officers and kept to their own functions and not be "bled white" by being made the subject of drafts for other service. That was, to his mind, the most admirable exposition of the duty of the Militia that he had ever heard. He could tell from his own personal experience an incident showing how absolutely destructive of the Militia was the policy of "bleeding white." A few months after the outbreak of the South African War a Militia battalion to which he belonged was embodied and reported at Aldershot. They came up about 700 strong in the rank and file, but within three months of their embodiment 250 of their best men, in fact their only good men, were drafted off to the line battalions in South Africa. They were then left with 450 men, of which fully two-thirds were middle aged men, who had lost the use of their legs, and the others were young men of seventeen or eighteen years of age who had not learned how to use theirs. They had an excellent band, an efficient body of officers, and a very good staff, but, for all practical purposes, they were useless to protect this country in case of a raid, and it would have been better if the Government had disbanded them, saved the cost, and spent the money in another direction. If the right hon. Gentleman would carry out his policy in regard to the Militia, he would receive the grateful thanks of everyone interested in that old historic force. As to recruiting, there was no difficulty with the Cavalry, or the Artillery, or the Guards, but the difficulty arose in regard to the regiments of the line. Although the position of recruits had been improved in respect of pay, allowances, and barrack accommodation, there was one thing in connection with the soldier which he never heard mentioned, which had some effect upon recruiting, and that was the question of uniform. Napoleon I. was supposed to know a good deal about soldiers and about human nature, and in his reign the uniforms in the French Army were rich to an extreme degree.

He was not advocating that the working dress of the British soldier should be made more attractive, but he thought the dress which he wore at church parade or upon ceremonial occasions and when he went home should be increased in attractiveness, and he would almost say in richness. Hon. Members must remember that a boy enlisted when he was seventeen, and promises of pension or of increased pay were not so attractive as a rich uniform and the love of adventure which all felt at that age. He suggested the appointment of a small Committee to go into this question, and, as the matter affected not only the recruit but his female relations, he thought it would be an advantage if the right hon. Gentleman could see his way to appoint some ladies on that Committee. The right hon. Gentleman might even enlist the sympathies or services of some of the ladies who beseiged the bedroom door of the Prime Minister some days ago. He wished to refer to the question of the number of units that should be kept in India for the defence of the country against foreign invasion. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to have rather an open mind upon the subject of whether 80,000 men was not too large a garrison to keep in India, and he noticed other hon. Members were taking the same line, for the reason that, owing to the recent war between Russia and Japan, we need not fear for a long time any aggression on the North-West Frontier on the part of Russia. It seemed to him that the result of the war would make us far more open to an attempt on the part of Russia to take India, for the reason that a great Empire like Russia was bound to expand unless she contracted. If she was prevented from expanding to the east she would only attempt to expand in the south-west, and we should be unwise to think of reducing the garrisons of India.

*MR. HAROLD COX (Preston) said he desired to associate himself with the congratulations which had been showered on the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War from all sides of the House. He accepted the French proverb that there was no such thing as a little economy. In dealing with public money every economy was a great economy, and therefore he welcomed the course the right hon. Gentleman was taking in looking into these matters and would, if he had the opportunity, give the right hon. Gentleman information which had come to him (Mr. Cox) which showed how thousands of pounds were being wasted. What they were concerned with now, however, was not thousands but millions. The country wanted to get back to the military standard which Lord Salisbury found sufficient for so long. As the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean had pointed out in regard to Army Estimates, we had to look not at what was paid by this country alone, but also at what was paid by India and the Colonies. The real problem of the Army was the problem of the defence of India. How did that work out financially? India and this country together maintained an Army costing £50,000,000 a year for the defence of the North-West frontier against Russia, whilst the cost of the Russian Army, which had to guard half a dozen frontiers, cost only £40,000,000. That would seem to be one serious reason for considering whether there should not be a reduction in the Army expenditure not only here but in India, and he was glad to hear the hint thrown out by the right hon. Gentleman that there was a possibility of reducing the Indian garrisons. In this regard he read with great pleasure last autumn a letter written by the late Secretary of State for War to an hon. Gentleman on the opposite side of the House, in which that right hon. Gentleman said that India would not run any immediate risk if her garrison was reduced to the point to which it was reduced during the time of the South African War. During the South African war at a time of great anxiety the Indian garrison was reduced, and if it could be reduced then it could be reduced now. It was then cut down to 63,000 men, but the late Secretary of State at the same time sanctioned the payment of bonus of £15 per annum in order to retain men in the service whose term had expired. The number of men in the Indian garrison was now 78,000, and that number of men had only been maintained by the payment of this bonus. If we were bound to the linked battalion system we were doubly bound to consider whether we were not maintaining more than a sufficient garrison to guard against t danger to which India was exposed. The reason put forward for that garrison was always the same. It was always the Russian bogey. But they had the statement of the late Prime Minister that the question of the invasion of India by Russia was not so much a question of men as of transport; that she could not invade India until she had built a railway through Afghanistan. At present the Russian railway terminated 400 miles from the North-West frontier of India, and the intervening region contained some of the most difficult mountainous country in the world, and such a railway could not be built for at least ten years. In order to send 100,000 men into India Russia would require 1,000,000 men to guard her lines of communication. By all means let us prepare for danger, but let us not prepare now for a danger which could not overtake us for ten years. With the command of the sea we could put our forces into the field on the North-West frontier of India quite as quickly as, if not more quickly than, Russia could get her troops there and at much less cost. We were justified in ignoring this danger also, because we had made a treaty with Japan which, while it reduced our difficulties by half, doubled those of Russia. Japan would attack her on the Manchurian Frontier and we should attack her in Afghanistan and also wherever we could get at her in Europe, and therefore the danger from Russia was so remote that we were wasting our resourses in preparing for it. There was a real danger at the present time that we might find the Indian Government pressing for a larger number of men for the reason that Lord Kitchener, in order to prepare for this danger of ten years hence, was withdrawing garrisons from India to place them on the frontier. He himself would guard against that danger by refusing such a request on the ground that troops were not at present wanted to guard against any external danger, and so far as any internal danger was concerned there was no necessity for a garrison of the present size. From his own personal experience he knew that the vast majority of the inhabitants of India were the gentlest and most easily governed people in the world, and if the Government of India, with its enormous resources of native troops and native police, wanted a garrison of 78,000 men to keep down such a population as that, in his opinion it amounted to a confession that they were governing them badly. The reduction of the Indian garrison would give immediate relief to both the Indian and the British taxpayer, because such a reduction in India must mean a corresponding reduction of the forces at home. The majority of this House were pledged to economy and they knew that that pledge could not be carried out unless there was a large reduction on the accounts for the Army. There were many other ways in which the Army might be reduced, but here was one which the experience of the South African War showed could at once be applied. He did not think the House sufficiently realised the financial strain put upon us. Few realised that the expenditure the House had already agreed to in principle was as great this year as it was last, and that there was no new source of revenue in sight. This meant that the same taxes which they had protested against last year as abnormal would be continued not only this year but next year. There would still be an income-tax of 1s. in the £, and there would still be heavy duties on tea and sugar and the export duty on coal. But there was a still more important point. If they agreed that there was no immediate danger of war in any part of the world but realised that there were always potentialities of war in the future, then it was for the future that they should make provision, and the best provision that this House could make for meeting future dangers was the building up of a great financial reserve. It was because he realised the necessity of building up such a reserve that he hoped the Government would cut down the Army expenditure.

Mr. Harold Cox.

SIR SAMUEL SCOTT (Marylebone, W.) said he did not understand the Secretary of State for War to indicate in any of his speeches that he intended to reduce the garrison of India, and he certainly hoped the hon. Gentleman had no intention of doing so. The hon. Member for Preston had advanced as an argument for reducing the garrison in India that, in the event of a war with Russia, the latter would be attacked by Japan on one side and by ourselves in Afghanistan. He would like to ask the hon. Gentleman, who seemed to acknowledge that one of the chief principles of defence was offence, in what manner we should be able to attack Russia in Afghanistan if we relieved our garrison of the necessary troops? He listened with interest last Thursday to the speech of his hon. and gallant friend the Member for the Abercromby Division of Liverpool on the subject of Army reduction, which had become a hardy annual with the hon. and gallant Gentleman. The House must have realised by this time that the hon. and gallant Gentleman had some cut and dried Army scheme in his pocket which he would produce eventually. They could all understand that during the late Government's term of office the hon. and gallant Member did not like to produce his scheme, but he might do so now, because he was certain the Secretary of State for War would be only too pleased to have it. One thing which struck him in the speeches of those who supported the hon. and gallant Gentleman's Motion was the fact that nearly every one began by stating that he had a mandate from his constituents for economy and retrenchment. It was proposed arbitrarily to reduce the Army by 10,000 men, but each Member who supported the reduction apparently had not the interests of the taxpayer in view, but some pet scheme of his own. The hon. and gallant Member who moved the reduction had an idea that by that means they would be able to increase the pensions of the men, and secure other laudable objects, which would cost money. The Secretary of State for War had struck out a totally new line. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that his idea was to inaugurate a policy which should be a continuous one, and to make the War Office less of an Aunt Sally which anybody could regard as a legitimate object at which to throw a stick. The right hon. Gentleman had done his best in his speeches to raise the War Office above Party politics and to place it on the same footing as the Admiralty. Those who had the interest of the Army at heart and had studied it at all knew that it was very much in need of a period of test. Of late years the Army had been a ground for experiments by successive Governments, and altogether there had been a little too much of Army reform, and a considerable amount of unrest had been created. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would now be able to see his way to give that period of rest to the Army which was so absolutely essential in its best interests. He wanted to ask the right hon. Gentleman one question. He noticed in his Memorandum that he had utilised some of the vacant rooms at Woolwich for the purpose of creating a new class, and augmenting the cadets at Sandhurst. The right hon. Gentleman was well aware that at Sandhurst the cadets with the cavalry and the cadets with the infantry were trained side by side. The cavalry officer required a somewhat different, and perhaps a more technical and higher, training, especially in reconnaissance duty, than the ordinary infantry officer, and he would therefore suggest to the right hon. Gentleman whether he might not utilise the class referred to at Woolwich purely for cavalry officers so that they could undergo a thorough and complete training in cavalry duties and all matters appertaining to reconnaissance.

MR. SOARES (Devonshire, Barnstaple) said he did not profess to understand the mysteries of the linked-battalion system or the various advantages of battalion training and depot training, but he should like to say a few words on the Vote from the point of view of the ordinary layman. There was, without doubt, a deep feeling of dissatisfaction in the country at the present time with regard to the enormous amount of military expenditure, and he himself believed it was shared by the Secretary of State for War as well as by the Prime Minister and those who sat on the Ministerial side. The only excuse that could be given for enormous estimates this year was that they were the estimates of the preceding Administration. What was the actual position at the present time? In 1895–6 the military expenditure of the country was £18,941,000; in 1904–5 it was £29,595,000; and for this year the estimates were £17,000 less than last year. He understood from the Secretary of State for War that the Army Estimates would have amounted to £800,000 more if he had not effected certain economies. How did he effect them ? The right hon. Gentleman told his military experts, he presumed, that they must reduce expenditure, and in nine weeks they knocked off this £800,000. They struck out items, he supposed, which they felt themselves able to strike out without injuring the efficiency of the Army. What he would like to ask was this : if these estimates could be reduced by £800,000 in nine weeks, could they have been reduced by £1,600,000 in eighteen weeks ? If so, they would have been very glad to have seen them so reduced. But were these military experts the same gentlemen who advised the previous Administration ? If the £800,000 were unnecessarily paid away in previous years it did not give the House overweening confidence in the military experts. He thought the desire of the right hon. Gentleman for continuity of policy and to take the Army out of the arena of Party politics was a very good thing. He should also like to see the Navy taken out of Party politics, as it was to a great extent, and also questions of foreign policy, but he was afraid that that was rather a desire which, owing to the infirmities of human nature, they could hardly hope to see fulfilled in this world, although it might be in the next, where the Liberal Party would always be in a strong majority. Nearly every speaker on the Opposition side had congratulated the Secretary of State for War, and he had been supported in the Lobby by the votes of hon. Members on both sides of the House. He had also been praised by all the Unionist newspapers in the country, many of them hostile to Liberal ideas of military policy. While the right hon. Gentleman was receiving all this chorus of praise he would remind him of the phrase Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes. He felt quite sure that when Members of the Opposition saw a chance to attack his right hon. friend they would be quite ready to turn and rend him with the greatest possible pleasure in the world. Therefore the Secretary of State for War must look entirely for support of his economic policy to hon. Members sitting on the Ministerial side. The Prime Minister had said the other night that the honour and good faith of the Government was bound up in a reduction of military expenditure. With that he agreed, and he was quite satisfied with that statement. At the recent election the Ministerialists received a mandate for economy, and they meant to carry out the promises made to their constituents. They had received a mandate for Free Trade, and to deal with the Education question, and they intended to carry it out. They had also received a mandate to abolish slavery and they were carrying that out. Then there was that everlasting mandate for peace, retrenchment, and reform. It was impossible for them to carry out these reforms unless they first had retrenchment. In his humble opinion they could get the money in only two ways—one was by imposing extra taxation on the rich, and the other by making large reductions in military expenditure. He believed that the Secretary of State for War held the fate of the Liberal Party in his hands at the present moment, and it was because he believed that the right hon. Gentleman realised his responsibility and had promised that so far as a man could do he would reduce the cost of the Army that he gave him his support the other night, and intended to support him again on this occasion.

*SIR W. EVANS GORDON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney) said the hon. Member for Barnstaple had warned them that the time might come when the Members of the Opposition would turn and rend the Secretary of State for War. He wished to point out that that was what had taken place already, but the attack came from below the gangway on the Ministerial side of the House ; and therefore the right hon. Gentleman could not complain of too harsh criticisms from the Opposition. He wished to join in the congratulations to the right hon. Gentleman for his recent speech. He had laid down certain principles which every sensible man and every earnest Army reformer must agree with. The right hon. Gentleman had rejected all things that did not make for fighting efficiency, and had told the House that he had been occupied in endeavouring to discover how much could be eliminated which did not make for fighting efficiency. He agreed with those sentiments, but he hoped and trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would have the courage to carry those principles to their logical conclusion. In a recent debate the right hon. Gentleman had been called upon to reduce the Army by 10,000 men in the course of the year. Those reductions might be quite possible when the Secretary of State had completed his inquiries, but he could never see why if those reductions were to be made they should be confined to one branch of the Service alone. The Regular Army had been spoken of as if it was the only part of the forces of the Crown that could be reduced; but, if the right hon. Gentleman carried out the principles he had enunciated he would also turn his attention to the Volunteers. The Secretary of State for War was a strong disciple of the "blue-water" school, and if the principles of that school were also carried to their logical conclusion, if what he said with regard to the possibility of invasion, or even of a serious raid was admitted, then the Volunteers, really and honestly regarded, became as obsolete and out of date as those forts and defences which the right hon. Gentleman had referred to in his opening speech. But he did not go so far as that. The Volunteers fulfilled a great and important part in the forces of the nation; but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not be content with merely putting down large figures, such as 270,000 men, without going closely into the military efficiency of the individuals who went to make up that number. Let him have a large force by all means; but, if his principles with regard to fighting efficiency were to be carried out, the right hon. Gentleman would find upon inquiry that there were large numbers of men in the Volunteers who were known to be of no fighting efficiency whatsoever, and who never would, under any amount of training, become really efficient soldiers, [Cries of "No, No," and "Oh, Oh," and "Why?"] If hon. Members would refer to the numerous reports such as those issued by the Norfolk Commission, and the Royal Commission on the War, they would find statements of witness after witness, of Volunteer and Militia officers, and statements made upon the highest military authority to the effect that there were large bodies of men in all branches of the Service, notably in the Volunteers and the Militia, who not only were not now efficient units, but who could show no prospect whatever of ever becoming efficient. He could quote passage after passage from the Blue-books to that effect. If that was the case he asked the Secretary of State for War in the process of this close inquiry which he was going to make to look carefully into that matter. He would ask him to confer with such experts as Sir George Clark, who more strongly than any other man had laid down the principle that we were simply living in a fool's paradise if we kept up large bodies of men who showed no prospect whatever of ever becoming really efficient fighting men. He wished to refer briefly to the orders which had been issued with regard to the brigading of the Volunteers. The Royal Commission on the War laid down that the Volunteer force should be organised on its war formation of brigades and divisions, that commanders and staff should be appointed, that they should hold no other appointments, and that they should be responsible for the training, instruction, and inspection of those bodies, and also for their mobilisation, and for leading them in time of war. The recent orders with regard to the brigading of Volunteers seemed to set aside that important recommendation. He noticed that nineteen brigades had been organised for coast defence and twenty-five brigades presumably for service in the field. Those brigades were composed of various numbers of battalions, some containing seven and others six, five, four, and three battalions. He did not think the Secretary of State for War could possibly argue that that was a war organisation in any shape or form, because such brigades could take no place in a war. It would be impossible for brigades of these different sizes to exist, and he submitted that if it was pretended that this was a war organisation it should be stated now because they ought not to delude themselves that the Volunteers were organised for war when that was not the case. With regard to the Militia, the right hon. Gentleman had told them that for a great many years past the Militia had been bled white in order to feed the Line. The Secretary of State for War, like many of his predecessors, objected to that, and thought it was a great evil and very bad for the Militia; but if the blood was to be maintained in the veins of the Militia, how was the right hon. Gentleman going to supply blood to the Regular Army? He knew that from year to year some 15,000 men passed from the Militia into the ranks of the Regular Army. A difficulty which had always occurred to him was that they would deprive themselves of recruits for the Regular Army if the Militia was to be turned into a popular force, and if men were to be attracted to it. The position at present was that there were not enough men to go round. The Volunteers were competing for men with the Militia in many districts, so that there were really three competing forces. No suggestion had been thrown out to overcome the difficulty of increasing the popularity and efficiency of the Militia without at the same time exercising a destructive influence on the Line. When the Militia Vote came to be discussed they would be able to find out more on that most important subject. In regard to the general staff, the Secretary of State in his speech referred to the great step in advance which had been taken by his predecessors. That was a very old fad of his own, and he had brought it forward ever since he had been in this House. He had even been snubbed for his pains. Once the late Prime Minister turned to him and said that he was suggesting the introduction into the British Army of German ideas which were not applicable to our military organisation. The time had now come when we no longer hesitated to imitate not only Germany in this respect, but every other great military Power on the Continent. He rejoiced that the Secretary of State saw from the outset the great importance and necessity of having a thinking department properly constituted. He understood that so far not very much progress had been made in establishing a general staff, and he would like the right hon. Gentleman to tell the Committee on what basis it was to be founded, and how far his military advisers, the Army Council and so forth, had gone in laying down the line as to how that body was to be recruited. The right hon. Gentleman was well aware that in Germany privileges were given to the permanent officers belonging to the general staff. The time taken for their promotion was shortened, and they got advantages of all kinds. They were thus encouraged to fit themselves for great and responsible positions as staff officers. The right hon. Gentleman in his speech said something about the scientific side of military affairs, and asked why degrees should not be given for arts and science for the Army as well as for other branches of science and art. He hoped that some scheme similar to that which at present existed in Germany in regard to passing through the general staff might be adopted in this country, and that thereby the very cream of our officers might be induced to qualify themselves in that way. As to India, he rejoiced to find that the anxiety which was displayed, after the right hon. Gentleman first spoke, as to the reduction of the garrison, was an anxiety which need not have occurred, and that in his second speech the right hon. Gentleman repudiated any desire of immediately—he himself hoped at any time—materially reducing the garrison in India. Although the possibility of the invasion of India might be remote, it would, he thought, be admitted that, in view of the present position of Russia, and of the fact that we had entered into a treaty with Japan, we should devote ourselves to the consolidation and the completion of our preparations for the defence of India. He hoped the question of the defence of India would be carefully thought out by the right hon. Gentleman and the Defence Committee before any decision was arrived at.

*MR. REES (Montgomery Boroughs) said the hon. Member for Barnstaple had appealed to the right hon. Gentleman on behalf of the Liberal Party, and said that the right hon. Gentleman in this matter held the fortunes of the Liberal Party in his hands. He hoped and believed it was not in that spirit that the right hon. Gentleman would deal with the Army. It was for that reason, and because of the proper and necessary deliberation with which he had dealt with reform and reductions, that they all rushed to his support on Thursday last, when the right hon. Gentleman had to repel the attack of a Parliamentary Mad Mullah with a following of Irregulars in the House. He used the term Mad Mullah, of course, in a Parliamentary sense, and he thought no description could be more suitable to the occasion. In moving the reduction of 10,000 men the hon. and gallant Member for Abercromby Division said he did not care when or how the reduction was made in these bloated armaments, provided that it was made. All he could say was that the expression he had used was an exceedingly moderate one, if reform in haste regardless of consequences was pressed upon a responsible Minister.

MAJOR SEELY (Liverpool, Abercromby) said he was sure the hon. Member did not wish to misrepresent what he did say. He must have got hold of a wrong report of the speech. He stated that the object of his Amendment was to suggest the propriety of the reduction in the following year. He asked the hon. Member not to misrepresent him.

*MR. REES said he would be extremely sorry to misrepresent the hon. Member, but he quoted from The Times, and having heard the speech he submitted it was a fair report of its substance. He formed his own impression of the speech, and of the effect which must be made in India and throughout the Empire and without it by the proposal to reduce the Army by 10,000 men, regardless of ways and means, or of any consideration with respect to the frontier of India.

MAJOR SEELY: I never suggested India. I specifically said "At home."

*MR. REES said they could not reduce the strength of the Army at home without necessarily affecting the Army in India. Russia had been crippled, it was true, for the present, but it was equally true that internal dissension never prevented a military autocracy from carrying out external aggression. Indeed internal dissension was sometimes a factor making for external aggression. He did not believe there was any danger of attack over the Indian frontier. Only the Emperor Paul, who was mad, and General Skobeleff, who was not a serious politician, had seriously contemplated such an insane expedition. There had been many invasions of India, but they had all been made by Afghans and others of a more or less local character who were able to get over the hills by arrangement with the tribes. He protested none the less that there was nothing in the present condition of Russia at all to justify us in relaxing our present establishment. He maintained that it was absolutely necessary that there should be no reduction in the battalions at home until the Secretary for War had had ample time to look into the whole question, and that it was altogether unreasonable to be dissatisfied with the large reductions made in a few weeks and to press for further specific promises. They should not press the right hon. Gentleman to make any hasty or ill-considered reduction. No one in the House was more committed to the policy of economy than he was; but reductions hastily made might lead eventually to larger charges, to expensive expeditions, and might disorganise the whole economic structure and trade of the Empire. There were, however, one or two directions in which some reforms might perhaps be effected at once without danger. There was the question of the capitation grant paid by India. When the subject of Indian expenditure was considered by this House, an hon. Member now on the front bench was of opinion that India should not be charged with that capitation grant. He did not profess to be a competent judge of these matters; but he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would tell the Committee whether something could not be done to relieve the Indian Exchequer in that respect. Then, there was the question of the payment of troops on the Indian establishment when they were employed out of India. He trusted that that matter would be settled in a manner satisfactory to the Indian Government. Such troops had been of the greatest possible service to the Empire during the late war in South Africa. He would also like, in a friendly and Parliamentary manner, to dissociate himself from the estimate of the British officer which had been given by the hon. Member for East St. Pancras. He realised the good intention of the hon. Member; but he could not accept his statement. There was a time, some thirty years ago, when it used to be said in India that the Civil Service represented brains and industry, and the Army represented the good looks and idleness. He admitted that so far as his experience went these estimates were altogether wrong. He had lived for years with officers of the British and Indian branches of the service, and was bound to say that they were exceedingly industrious, competent, and accomplished men of whom the country might be proud; and he had felt it his duty to say what he had done in their behalf in consequence of the remarks made by the hon. Member to whom he had just referred. It by no means followed that because men were brave in war they were idle and incompetent in time of peace.

LORD CASTLEREAGH (Maidstone) hoped his intervention in the debate would not be thought presumptuous, seeing he had had various opportunities of studying this question from an expert point of view. Hon. Gentlemen on the Ministerial benches had expressed sentiments in favour of economy on the Army, but there was no question of economy when they advocated a system of free meals for poor children, old-age pensions, and payment of Members. No practical suggestions had been made by hon. Gentlemen opposite as to the particular lines along which economies in the expenditure on the Army should be made. He admitted that there were various small matters in which economy could be carried out; but no large economy could be brought about without seriously endangering the efficiency of the Army. In the branch of the Army with which he was connected, he granted that some saving might be effected in the purchase of horses. Large profits were often made by a few men in making these purchases. As to the reduction of the Indian Army, he urged that that would be a menace to the safety of the Indian Empire. Something had been said as to the possible invasion of India by Russia. He would not, for one moment, minimise that danger; but he contended that the internal condition of affairs in India required as big a garrison as was there at the present moment. And the reason was that the Indian Government had to show its strength, that our rule was strong, and that that strong rule was accompanied by great benefits to the people of India. It should be borne in mind that the Indian Mutiny followed the withdrawal of various battalions of English troops to be sent to the seat of war with Russia in the Crimea. The reduction of the garrison in India might therefore be attended with the most disastrous consequences. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had said that he intended to reduce the expenditure on military reconnaisances. He (the speaker) held that one of the most important phases of the education of officers was the ability for the performance of these reconnaisances. The raising of the pay of the soldier by the late Government had perhaps induced a certain amount of additional recruiting; but he felt that the class of men whom it was desired to attract to the Army had not been so attracted. An hon. Member had alleged that the feeling of the people of the country did not encourage soldiering; but he maintained that it was the duty of the nation to encourage the military spirit, because we had no conscription, and he sincerely trusted we never should have. The consequence was that the Government had to compete in the labour market for recruits to fill up the ranks of the Army. What had been said by his hon. friend as to the uniforms of the soldiers was very important, because a recruit of eighteen years of age or so was attracted by a handsome uniform which he could wear when he walked out on Sunday with his girl. He hoped the Secretary for War would hold out some inducement to the soldiers to put by a certain amount of their pay. The old system of deferred pay and of military savings' banks was most excellent in enabling the soldiers to make some provision for old age. All hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House desired to congratulate the right hon. the Secretary for War on the reforms he had already accomplished, although he did not think the right hon. Gentleman had received much encouragement from his friends on his own side of the House. He would remind these hon. Gentlemen that false economy would be of no benefit to efficiency, but might result in disaster to the Empire.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I think I may suggest to the Committee that the object of a general discussion is not for the purpose of raising any small points which may be brought forward on a particular Vote. It is that hon. Members may raise points of importance which cannot be brought forward upon any one of those Votes when considered separately, and I would therefore suggest that matters of detail arising on subsequent Votes had better be deferred to a subsequent time.

*MR. MOLTENO (Dumfriesshire) said he also wished to congratulate the Secretary of State for War upon the able and masterly speech in which he showed the basis upon which we must work if we would have real reform of our Army system. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to India and our colonial garrisons, and the latter seemed to afford considerable hope of reduction. After the Crimean war in 1858 attention was drawn to the enormous cost in men and money of these garrisons. We then had 47,000 men, costing just under £4,000,000 sterling. The Estimates of this year showed that we now had 58,000 men at a cost of £5,000,000 sterling, so that the expenditure in 1858 was greater in proportion to our resources than it was to-day. In 1859 a Departmental Committee was appointed, consisting of Mr. Hamilton of the Treasury, Mr. Godley of the War Office, and Sir T. Elliott of the Colonial Office, to go into this question, and they reported in 1860 and laid down the true policy on this subject. They said that it was bad strategy to scatter small garrisons all over the world; that the defence of colonies really depended upon the will and determination of the people who inhabited them; that reliance on Imperial troops must perpetuate in the colonies a feeling of dependence on the mother country, and conduce to recklessness of policy, neglect of local efforts, and the absence of that spirit of self-reliance which was the very essence of their prosperity. Further. the report of the Committee showed that—

> "Colonial garrisons when not very large and in first-class fortresses had always found themselves in traps at the mercy of naval expeditions."

The Committee laid down the principle of withdrawal of troops from all colonies with the exception of great fortresses, and that if any troops were to remain they should be paid for at their full cost by the colony which asked for them. That Report was in 1861 discussed in Committee of the House, of which Mr. Arthur Mills was chairman. That Committee condemned the plans of colonial fortification and laid down the main principle that—

> "the tendency of modern warfare is to strike blows at the heart of a hostile Power and requires a concentration of troops at home, trusting to naval supremacy for securing against foreign aggression the distant dependencies of the Empire."

In 1862 there was also a discussion upon that Report in this House, and this House fully accepted and affirmed the recommendation of the Committee. Thereupon the policy of reduction of colonial garrisons was carried out by successive Secretaries of State on both sides of the House, as it was held that colonists must, like the rest of His Majesty's subjects, bear the cost of civil and military establishments. Mr. Cardwell first commenced the withdrawal of troops from New Zealand, and they now knew that it was long since all troops in that colony had been withdrawn. In the case of South Africa Lord Carnarvon and Earl Granville commenced the reduction of the troops, and the Duke of Buckingham commenced a similar policy in Canada. What was the result? By the year 1877 the troops in the colonial garrisons had been reduced to 24,700 costing £1,769,000, just about half the numbers and cost of 1858. In pursuance of that policy, 16,721 men were withdrawn from North America, Australia, the Ionian Islands, Windward and Leeward Islands, Falkland Islands and the Bahamas, and if they left out the Mediterranean and Egypt and counted only those stations at which we still had troops, viz., North America, Africa, China, and Ceylon, the troops had been reduced from 19,471 in 1858 to 11,134 in 1878. He referred to the year 1878 because it was in that year that we again had an increase of colonial garrisons. Sir Bartle Frere went out to South Africa and thought it desirable to have fresh troops there. He suggested that fresh regiments should be sent out to Cape Colony and to Natal. Objection was taken by those colonies to having those troops and paying for them, but still his advice was followed and then there came a very large increase of garrisons. The result was that the troops were doubled in 1878–79, and the cost was doubled. In the following year, 1879–80, the troops were trebled and the cost was trebled. We were in consequence finally led into the war which from 1878 to 1881 caused an expenditure of £5,500,000, and a very large increase of garrisons from £208,000 to £1,000,000 in 1881. We got tired of this and recalled Sir Bartle Frere and the troops. We reduced the garrison to 3,473 in 1896 just where it stood in 1878. How did the figures stand in regard to these stations and the Estimates now before the House? The numbers were 36,909, or an increase beyond 1878 of 25,750. He was not referring to those Colonies which had no garrison, because we had in 1858 no less than 16,700 men in Colonies which had no garrison to-day. The enormous increase had taken place in those places where we had garrisons to-day. He should like to point out where the principal increases were: South Africa, from 3,357 to 19,983; Mauritius, from 583 to 3,352; Hong Kong and North China, from 1,122 to 7,233. He was unable to say anything about Mauritius or Hong Kong and North China except that he wished to express the hope that the garrisons might be reduced, as he thought that with a peaceful policy they might proceed to a considerable reduction. But in regard to South Africa the cause of the increase was clear, and was directly due to the policy pursued from this country. The Departmental Committee to which he had referred drew attention to the condition of South Africa at that time, and he should like to draw attention to what they said on that occasion, as the conditions resembled those which prevailed to-day. They said—

> "Above all, there is the gigantic anomaly of expenditure on the Cape. We cannot avoid calling the especial attention of His Majesty's Government to the drain on British resources which has resulted from our undertaking the reference of this Colony, and to that inadequacy of benefits resulting to British products. As affording a field for British emigration, a supply of our wants, or a market for our produce, our connection with the Colony has not been, comparatively speaking, of any considerable advantage to us. In fact, the only direct object of Imperial concern is the use of the roadsteads at Table and Simon's Bays. Yet in 1857–8, a period of exceptional tranquility, we had at the Cape, including the German Legion, a garrison, or rather Army, of 10,759 Regular troops, and the military expenditure alone was £830,687, equal to more than one-fifth of the expenditure on the whole of the Colonies, including the Mediterranean Garrisons."

Sir Thomas Eliott in his report says—

> "The above expenditure is enormous, and is not likely ever to be materially reduced except by a Radical change of policy."

He was glad to say that that Radical change of policy took place, and the troops were, as he had already stated, reduced by Lord Carnarvon and Earl Granville, and the Colonies were told to rely upon their own forces, which they had since done and shown that they were perfectly well able to protect and defend themselves. He had shown that that change of policy took place, because the 10,759 of 1858 were reduced to 3,357 in 1878. In the latter year the increase insisted upon by Sir Bartle Frere took place, to which he had already referred, and this led to the Zulu War and the war of 1881, upon which we spent £5,500,000 and increased the cost of garrison from £208,000 to £1,000,000 in 1881. Then another change of policy was made and on January 7th, 1896, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham telegraphed to Sir Hercules Robinson that—

> "He was considering in concert with his colleagues, the propriety of immediately sending a large force, including cavalry and artillery, to the Cape to provide for all eventualities."

On the 8th Sir Hercules Robinson replied—

> "I should deprecate the proposed despatch of a large force."

The policy pursued by Sir Hercules Robinson received universal approval in South Africa, and up to the eve of the War the Cape and Natal protested against the use of force. He had simply given this record to show that there had been no local demand for troops, and also to illustrate the fact that the departures from the policy laid down in 1862 by the House had led to disastrous increase of expenditure and of garrisons in South Africa. They all knew what this policy of interference in South Africa meant. The lesson was plain. Why not leave South Africa alone, as we had frequently been requested to do by all responsible authorities there, to manage their own affairs, just as in Canada and Australia we left them alone? They were perfectly able in South Africa to manage their own affairs if we would only leave them alone, and we might then withdraw all the troops in excess of those who were there in 1895. The enormous cost entailed upon us by their presence was given yesterday in a Reply by the Secretary of State for War. It appeared from that answer that the average expenditure on troops and fortifications since the war was £5,343,000 per annum. The expenditure under military works loans was £3,040,000 for the three years 1903–4 to 1905–6, and the cost borne on the Army Estimates for that period was £12,990,000, making up the total of £16,030,000, which gave the average he had stated. But there was another very serious danger involved in leaving this body of troops in South Africa, because there was, as the Departmental Committee had pointed out, the risk of our becoming involved in native wars. The Colonists might pursue an aggressive and high-handed policy, relying on the presence of the troops. If we allowed the use of Imperial troops we must interfere to control policy. This was a fatal system, as had been shown in the past history of the Cape. If our troops were involved it became a question of one power fighting for another power quarrelling, which was a recipe for endless war. There was a very serious danger in pursuing this course, and the only safe policy was to leave Colonists to rely upon their own resources and to feel responsible for any defect of policy. He had observed that the Conservative Party at the end of last year were recommended to follow the advice of Mr. Disraeli in order to get back to their former proud position. Mr. Disraeli said on the 15th of July, 1865—

> "I am myself in favour of a conservative foreign policy—a policy which believes that the tranquillity of the world is the interest of England; that peace is the normal aim, and that in the tranquillity of the world the state or best objects of English ambition may be legitimately obtained . . . . Since I have been in Parliament—now twenty-seven years—there has only occurred one occasion on which war was justifiable on our part, and even then it was a war which we could not enter upon without hesitation, but still it was a war necessary for the interests of the world."

He drew special attention to those words "justifiable" and "necessary."

> "That was the Crimean War, and on that ground I supported it. I have seen no cause since for the warlike interference of England in the affairs of Europe or America."

It was a remarkable fact that that one war, the only justifiable war in the opinion of Mr. Disraeli, was the one war which all now agreed was unnecessary. So it was with all wars. Were we never to advance? Were nations always to distrust each other? Were we always to give way to those who held the view that force was the only means of settling disputes between nations?

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover) said he was not sanguine—he did not put it higher than that—that it would be possible materially to reduce our garrisons abroad. An hon. Member had referred to Mr. Disraeli. He thought it was Mr. Disraeli who said—

> "Tell me your policy, and I will tell you what your armaments must be."

The application of that maxim was not more obvious in any part of the world than in South Africa. If, as he trusted, the policy of the Government in South Africa might be calculated to maintain and to foster the loyalty and devotion to the Mother country of all our white fellow-subjects in South Africa, then, and then only, it might be reasonable to hope that at some future date we might be able to reduce the garrison in South Africa. But if the policy of the Government should not be a policy of non-interference, but should be a policy of interference in matters which excited more feeling in South Africa than any other question, why, then, so far from looking forward to a reduction of the garrison, we might look with foreboding to the possibility that the garrison might have to be increased. It was not only true that the number of our armaments depended on foreign and Colonial policy, but it was also true that the cost of our armaments depended on domestic policy. We could not raise the standard of living or labour in this country—a most desirable object—without increasing the discrepancy between the conditions of life of the Regular soldier and the conditions of life of the artisan, and therefore, every Secretary of State for War, and the right hon. Gentleman in common with his predecessors, had, before he could consider the possibility of effecting a reduction, to counteract automatic increases. The pressure put upon him that the soldier should be better housed, better clothed, and better fed, and that he should have more opportunities of legitimate relaxation, led necessarily to the automatic increase of the cost of the Army. He could not quite accept the view that the right hon. Gentleman had effected immense reductions in the Estimates because he was imbued by views not shared by his right hon. friend his predecessor. His right hon. friend had to his knowledge, year in and year out, striven, and not without success, to cut down the cost of the Army. If he could he wished he might disabuse some hon. Members opposite of a suspicion which they apparently entertained. They seemed to think that his right hon. friend and hon. Members on his side of the House took a delight in spending money on the Army for the mere sake of spending money. They were in complete error. Every man who cared, as he cared, for the efficiency of the Army, knew that the greatest peril to that efficiency was the fact that it cost £29,000,000 or more every year. There was not a man who desired to see our forces on the most efficient and economic basis who would not, if he could, hail the right hon. Gentleman with acclamation supposing he could effect a reduction of one or two millions on the Estimates, without decreasing the efficiency of the Army. But many of them knew that the difficulties with which he had to contend were very great, and they applauded him for pledging himself to no plan during his first session in office. Far from cavilling at anything in his speeches which did not seem to accord absolutely with their own ideas, their only plea was that he would not allow his theories to crystallise into a plan until he had weighed very carefully and fully our forces in all their aspects, for they were very multifarious. Part of the difficulty with which any Secretary of State had to contend was that the legacy, not from his immediate predecessor, but from past history, was the legacy of different theories of the Army, different schemes of defences which had come into being under conditions which prevailed then but did not prevail now, but which could not be suddenly abolished. They could not, in view of a new theory, suddenly dispense with all that had been bequeathed to them in consequence of theories now obsolete, but which at the time they were entertained might have been thought as reasonable as the theory of the "blue-water" school which the right hon. Gentleman was now putting forward, and therefore they ought to be very patient in this attempt to secure economy. If they abolished anything which existed they must find a substitute. The abolition cost them abolition terms, and, having made the substitute, they found themselves driven, year by year, into making it more palatable by spending more money upon it than they originally intended to spend. So that there was something to be said for conservatism, not as a Party principle, but as a principle which must actuate all Governments to a certain extent, whether they were Liberal or Conservative. The difficulty of Secretaries of State for War was that they had the relics of all these different theories to deal with. They could not abolish them; they had to adapt them to the theory of the day. The right hon. Gentleman had pushed what was called the theory of the "blue-water" school very far, and the question they ought to consider was, Had he pushed it too far? He did not think the right hon. Gentleman intended to push it too far. It was urged with truth, on the other side, that no Navy, however overwhelming, could finish a war. In any fight they must be able to hit as well as parry. Unless they could strike a blow at their adversary in the course of a war the war would never come to an end. Again, it was true that we might have to fight not one, but two first-class Powers. To put that fear in a more ominous guise, we might be fighting one first-class Power for several months or a year and then be attacked by another first-class Power. The fear of that led many thoughtful men to hold that the "blue-water" theory was being pushed too far, and that in view of the danger which, though remote, was possible, we must have a home defence army in spite of all that the theorists said. Even if the fear of invasion in this case was an illusory fear, the fact that it existed was a matter that had to be taken into account. One form of insurance was not only that against invasion, but against panic, and if this country were at war it would be of immense assistance to the Government that their countrymen should not be the prey of grave fears which might have been allayed, perhaps at no great expenditure of money. In spite of all that he was prepared to say that the right hon. Gentleman, if he understood him aright, was not pushing this theory too far. The right hon. Gentleman had laid it down that we required a striking force. The right hon. Gentleman did not pledge himself to its size, but he did not reject the view that it ought to be the size of three Army Corps. The right hon. Gentleman did not object to the view that we ought to have ready in this country for conflict with trained European troops, he supposed, at least nine divisions of infantry and the proper amount of cavalry and artillery which should go with nine divisions of infantry. If we had this force ready to embark there would be no panic, but we could not embark them until we had established our supremacy on the sea, and we could not embark them if our Navy had been defeated. If it were true that we could not embark a striking force until we were in that position, then danger of invasion on a great scale was as visionary as the theorists declared it to be. If we came into conflict with a great Power, from the outbreak of hostilities we should have to begin to form and train as large an Army as we possibly could. But if we were to have economy in peace our organisation for the striking force of nine or ten divisions could not be totally distinct from the organisation for feeding our peace garrison abroad. That created a slight presumption in favour—he would not say of the linked battalion—but certainly of a battalion system as against a depot system at home, or otherwise we should have to pay far more than we did at present. We had now about eighty-five regiments abroad. After about five years abroad a soldier ceased to be as good a man as he was the first five years, so that new drafts had to be sent out every year to take the place of individual soldiers, and it was bad for any regiment to remain abroad for more than fifteen years. Thus in time of profound peace we had to send between 20,000 and 30,000 men abroad every year, and it should not be impossible to make the organisation for supplying these men coincide with the organisation for our striking force. It did create a presumption in favour, at any rate, of battalions, though not necessarily of linked battalions, and it did create a presumption against depot training, although he believed there must be both in any system. He thought we should aim at getting large and good depots. A very high authority once told him that if we wanted to work our drafts and reliefs by battalions it was no use having four battalions to a regiment; but a good deal of battalion training could be given if regiments were divided into eight battalions, with five abroad and three at home. Could not the right hon. Gentleman arrive at some scheme which would give the training advantages of the battalions and some of the advantages also of the large depots by grouping the Army into larger groups? The Secretary of State had himself laid it down that even in the "blue-water" theory we needed a great power of expansion behind our striking force in order to finish a war within a reasonable time. What had we to look to? The Reserves, the Volunteers, and the manhood of the nation. Yes, but all those forces must be susceptible of training at the time of the outbreak of war. He could imagine no more calamitous day for this country than for legions of men to come clamouring for guidance and finding there were not enough regimental officers and that there was not a staff. There would be the metal but not the mould into which that metal was to be poured. It might sound a simple thing, but one of the hardest problems in the art of war was to show people where to go, how to get there, and what to do when they got there. Problems of time, distance, and direction lay at the very core of the whole art of war. If that were so, it was clear that some plan was wanted which would give plenty of regimental officers, and a highly trained staff, and that again raised a presumption against dispensing with battalions absolutely at home. It was difficult to train men except in battalions, but he defied them to train officers unless there were battalions. The whole success of an attack often depended on hitting the right place in an enemy's position. He defied them to train a staff properly unless they had battalions. They must get each division absolutely and accurately on the very place on the map from which it could strike, and if it deviated by the smallest angle the whole attack might perish. Bad staff work made success impossible. No staff could be trained unless it had battalions, brigades, and divisions with which it could be trained. It did not follow that they must all be Regular battalions, but there must be Regular battalions in sufficient number to supply the nucleus of each brigade during the minor manœuvres which must take place when regimental officers and staff officers were to be trained to meet the day of war. If those conditions were observed he thought we needed some simplification. The Secretary of State already had at his disposal a large number of kinds of troops—the Regular battalion abroad, the Regular battalion at home, the small depot, the large depot, the Militia, the Militia Reserve, the Volunteers, the Volunteer Reserve, and rifle clubs; and now there was a project for giving some slight training to anybody who would undergo it. Some simplification was absolutely necessary if any economy was to be effected. How were we to get it? He did not believe the right hon. Gentleman could materially alter the present condition of the Volunteers. He thought the right hon. Gentleman had better leave the Volunteers to expand at the proper time, and if he had the necessary staff officers to guide them perhaps we should make the best of the Volunteers under those conditions. But what was he going to do with the Militia? The Militia he would be driven either to let down towards the status of the Volunteers or to lift up towards the status of the Regular Army. Existing in the air as it did now between the Regular Army and the Volunteers the Militia would die out. He thought the solution of the problem would be not to absorb the Militia in the Line, but to establish some strong and close relation between the home battalions, the large depots, and the Militia. That was an integral portion of Lord Cardwell's original theory; and it was foreshadowed in a marvellous paper written by Pitt to William Wyndham, which showed that they must use the territorial system to bring the Militia and depots and home battalions into some close relationship. He apologised to the Committee for having made these few observations, and he thanked the Government for having given the Committee an opportunity of taking a bird's-eye view of the whole field of military defence. The Secretary for War had his best wishes for his success.

MR. HALDANE said the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had made a speech of the highest interest, because he had reviewed from a very broad standpoint questions of the most far-reaching kind in connection with military organisation. He believed with the right hon. Gentleman that these questions must be treated as a whole; that the organisation of the Army, heterogeneous though that Army was, was one and indivisible; and yet, as had been said, one was confronted at every turn by difficulties. The right hon. Gentleman had begun his speech with a rather gloomy forecast about economy. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman was mistaken in that respect. He had always thought economy was not a thing that would be accomplished at a stroke, that it was easier to talk about than to effect; but because it was difficult it was not impossible. The noble Lord the Member for Maidstone had said that the Secretary for War had received more encouragement from the Opposition side of the House than from his own, but he did not think the noble Lord was right. On his banner was inscribed, no doubt, the word "efficiency," but the word "economy" was also inscribed upon it, and on the question of economy he was bound to say that he had received most ample encouragement from the Ministerial side of the House—as much as he could possibly desire. For efficiency he had received much encouragement too. He could not help thinking that hon. Members ought not to grudge him the transient momentary popularity which he enjoyed. By that time next year it was possible—if he were disposed to indulge in gloomy forebodings—that he might see himself the most unpopular War Minister there had been for a long time. [AN HON. MEMBER: That will want a lot of doing.] Economies were not easy to effect, and the right hon. Gentleman had been well advised in referring to the difficulty of automatic increases. Automatic increases were always taking place, and the worst of it was that not only had one to deal with necessary automatic increases, but also with automatic increases which might have been avoided which were the result of changes of policy, perhaps dating a very long way back, and which were not easy to alter when once they had become operative. Yet, notwithstanding all the difficulties, it seemed to him that there was room in the present condition of things for—he would not put it higher—a hope of economy, substantial economy, in Army organisation. He did not say that he individually could do it, but he did say that he thought it could be done. He could not forget that the Estimates had gone up £11,500,000 in the very short time of about ten years, and he could not forget that even taking the ideal of a striking force of three Army corps, or nine divisions, on the Indian basis, there was a vast surplus which arose from want of organisation of the Army as a whole. He gave the figures the other day, simply quoting them roughly and from memory. We required for the nine divisions 130,000 men. We had, on the footing of mobilising, as we wanted to mobilise for this purpose, our reserves, and taking into account the Militia and Yeomanry, 330,000 men in the country—a surplus of 200,000 men. We wanted a large amount of support for etceteras, but 200,000 was an enormous surplus, and it seemed to him hard if it were not possible to get out of that something very substantial indeed in the way of reduction. It also seemed to him that such a reduction ought to be compatible with more efficiency, and to be possible with a very substantial body of men who were not really required for any Imperial organisation on the basis of nine divisions or three Army corps. That, at any rate, was the problem which the War Secretary to-day had to face. The Member for Croydon had faced it, and he appreciated thoroughly the way in which he had desired to get at the solution of the problem. But he had never been able to agree with the right hon. Gentleman. He felt himself much nearer to the Member for Dover in this matter. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of what had been called—and he agreed with him that it was an unsatisfactory name—the linked-battalion system. It was better to speak of feeding and training battalions. The system was one in which, instead of depots being used to train or feed, battalions were used for this purpose. He agreed that the system was not one to be lightly or rashly abandoned. He did not pledge himself to it, but he felt that it was a system which had a great deal of promise and potency in it, and he was astonished at the acerbity which had been introduced into this matter. As to the controversy to which the system had given rise, he could only say that he had taken part in many controversies, theological and political, controversies of every sort, but in none had he noticed a sharper division of opinion than on this question of battalions versus depots as instruments of training for the British Army. It was hopeless to expect to get men to agree about it. We might as well expect them to agree about predestination. This controversy would go on in the House session after session, with the result that the only way the unfortunate Secretary for War who desired to learn could pursue was to listen to all sides and, after hearing all that was to be said, to take his own way. He could only say at this moment that whatever might be said against our system of feeding battalions, it had a great many advantages —advantages to which the Member for Dover had already referred. For our money we got more cadres under this than under any other system. The home cadre was very important from the point of view of fighting efficiency. It was only in time of peace that the home battalion which fed the battalion abroad was passing drafts through it. In time of war the reserve was called out and these skeleton battalions—skeleton battalions so far as efficient fighting men were concerned — were clothed. In the Cardwell system they preserved the spirit of territorialism. All he wished to observe about the Cardwell system was that it was a system from which he was not going to depart lightly. He might have to depart from it; but he would have to know a reason very definitely before making a change which seemed to him to go to the root of the organisation of the British Army. Depots must not only be great depots, but they must do very different work from anything they knew any depot was doing now. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to Caterham. He was himself at Caterham very recently, and he found that the Guards recruit received sixteen week's training there. His battalion, of course, was always at home, and he was trained in his battalion at home. He had only sixteen weeks in that big depot. The depot itself never could produce the training of the battalion, though it could give education and a certain amount of preparation to the soldier which would enable him to work better at battalion work; but the work of the battalion it could not give. Moreover, there was another great difficulty in these large depots. India would not take troops who were not seasoned—troops less than twenty years of age. The reason of that was to be found in the conditions of health in India. How were men of twenty years of age to be got from a depot at home? A depot was not a place where a man could be kept a couple of years; and if it was required to recruit men in this country over eighteen years of age, it would be found that the conditions of the country made it impossible to get all that were required. It would be found that at that age men got into employment, or perhaps got married. A man could not be kept at the depot for more than a few months; and the class required to be trained for India, to be employed there and put to work when they had reached the age of twenty and not before, could not be got in this country in any great quantities. Therefore they were thrown back on the battalion system for training the soldier to pass through the Indian battalion that was linked to it and then to be brought home to the Reserve. Taking it from whatever point of view, it seemed to him, as at present advised, that the linked battalion system was the most workable. The figures with which they were all familiar showed that about 65,000 men at home fed about 85,000 abroad. He included in the term "abroad" the battalions on short tour in the Mediterranean at this time. They therefore wanted about 27,500 a year to feel the 85,000 abroad. Taking that number out, there were left 37,500 available for home service. It seemed to him that the feeding battalion system was a system which required to be considered very carefully; and they should pause before they abolished it as going to the root not only of the present organisation of the Army, but, as he was rather inclined to think, though he said it with all reserve, of further developments which ought to take place, such as a more complete territorial organisation. The right hon. Gentleman opposite had spoken of South Africa and the policy which turned on South Africa. He said that the Government would be doing a very rash thing if they interfered to any large extent with the establishment kept up in South Africa, unless they were perfectly certain, as he understood him, of satisfying the British element, which was our nearest concern over there. He agreed that they must satisfy that element; but there was another element they must satisfy also. If there was to be peace and tranquillity in South Africa so that our policy might enable us to reduce armaments, they must satisfy both Boer and Briton. That was what they had to work out; and he agreed that until they had satisfied, not merely the one element, but the other also, it would be very difficult to bring things on to a harmonious footing and to reduce our garrison out there. But, at the same time, he was not sure that the maintenance of a large garrison in South Africa was just the thing to conduce most to that harmony of which he spoke. Let the matter be worked out by all means; but he was not sure that its working out was assisted by keeping up in a prominent and ostentatious fashion anything like a large military display. There had been striking confirmation in the history of the country of the valuable results that had sometimes come from the withdrawal of a garrison at an opportune moment. The right hon. Gentleman opposite also spoke of the "blue-water" principle and the danger of pushing it too far. He agreed that it could be treated as an abstract principle, and could be pushed too far. They could not justify, of course, the keeping up of the Volunteers if they were out and out for the "blue-water" school; but this nation was governed, as Mr. Disraeli once said, not by logic but by Parliament. This Parliament was just as much Parliament after the general election as the Parliament of a year or twenty years ago, and as long as Parliament remained Parliament, this country would never be logical. Therefore there was no danger of their running to extreme courses over "blue-water" principles. He agreed with some of the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman opposite about both the Volunteers and the Militia; they had to consider them also as well as the Regular Army in considering our fighting efficiency. The country had no right to keep them up to the present point unless it got value for its money. He thought he went a little slower than the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon in his way of approaching these things. He thought the country could get value for its money out of both the Militia and the Volunteers without taking any sudden or strong step with regard to them. They could not, however, be left as they were now. Volunteers hovered between being Regular soldiers and not being soldiers at all. They could not be justified as men to be put against Regulars without a great deal more training than they got at the present time, and they could not get that training in time of peace. On the other hand, the Militia, he agreed, must have something done. They must be brought nearer to the Regular Army, and the Regular Army also must be brought nearer to them. He did feel that the Militiaman was a soldier, but he was a civilian for nine-tenths of his time, and they had to see that during the remaining one-tenth of his time, when he was a soldier, he acted as a soldier. During that time he wanted to be levelled up very much more, and he wanted to serve under his own officers. Again, the Militia ought not to be bled of its best men. The best men ought not to be taken out of every company. But the Militia should be none the less a support to, and in another sense a reserve for, the Regular Army. The Militiaman was nearer than the Volunteer to the Regular Army. He was a Regular soldier for part of his time, and a definite function must be assigned to him. When that function was assigned to him he believed the Militiaman would cheerfully accept it, and the Militia would once more become a popular service. No one could tell what mischief was done both to the Militia and the Volunteers by not assigning to them definite functions. It was not that they needed to be stirred into action. They had shown what they could do. But to-day we had no definite notions of what we wanted to do with the Volunteers and Militia. He believed the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Croydon had definite ideas, but he thought they were too definite. He thought that if a proper and definite place was assigned to the Volunteers and the Militia in the organisation, it would be possible, without suddenly revolutionising anything, to bring them into line in such a way as to get value for our money and to get them in a concentrated form such as they were not in at the present moment. On the whole, though it was a policy which some might regard as open to a certain amount of suspicion, he believed that his own view of trusting to soldiers, and trusting to them even in matters of economy, was not only easiest, but cheapest. After all, they were dealing with matters of a highly technical kind, and soldiers were just as good economists as anybody else. If they got the chance, and if a Minister set to work to get their sympathy on his side, there was not a man in the War Office who did not desire to bring down the cost of the Army if it could possibly be done consistently with efficiency, and there were many men there who thought that the efficiency which all desired could be obtained for a less expenditure of money than it cost at the present time. He thought that was the spirit which existed among the military experts, and when that spirit existed among the military experts it was well to have them on one's side. It was desirable in the interests of economy to work with the experts, and, above all, to have a settled policy accepted as far as possible by both Parties, and by that great middle element which set the tone to both Parties, which would enable one to carry on continuously without sudden reversals and upheavals always resulting in vast expenditure. The policy of grouping regiments, which had been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, required to be pursued with extreme caution. It might mitigate some of the pressure which occasionally arose under the Cardwell system, although that pressure had been exaggerated. He was a Scotsman, and, although only a Lowlander, would shrink from the notion of grouping kilts in the Highland regiments. There would be peril of exciting jealousies if these regiments, with their distinctive traditions and tartans, were grouped. The noble Lord the Member for Maidstone had not sufficiently distinguished between reconnaissances and staff rides, The surveys of the terra ought not to be surveys of the terra of the United Kingdom, but of places where there was real use for such services. What an advantage it would have been if the money spent on surveys some years ago in preparing for the defence of the United Kingdom, which was already adequately defended by the Fleet, had been spent in surveying South Africa! In the last war we had no maps, no information about positions. The right figure which he should have given as the cost of staff surveys in this country was £7,000, not £14,000. He would consider the proposal of the hon. Member for West Marylebone with regard to cadets, but thought there might be difficulties in the way. He reminded the hon. Member for Blackpool that there were more urgent matters to be attended to before much money could be spent on clothes. He did not think there was a great deal to be complained of in the present dress. The Army was, and must be, on short commons for some time. There was no room for luxuries. The reduction of £800,000 had been referred to by the hon. Member for Barnstaple. That reduction was made by severe pruning down expenses without any sacrifice of efficiency; to cut down to the same extent again would not be done with ease or in a short time. He did not say it could not be done; it was the very business on which he should be embarked during the next twelve months. But the only undertaking he could give was that he would do his best to effect further savings. But let him do it in his own way, and with the co-operation of the soldier. He did wish to get it into the heads of all about him that this was really the way that gave most hope of success.

Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Croydon) did not like to say, "vixere fortes ante Agamemnona multi"; but he wanted to say in his own justification that there had been people at the War Office before the right hon. Gentleman who had not been stone blind and stone deaf. The right hon. Gentleman had enumerated to the House a number of larger and smaller changes as the result of applying thought to matters on which there was need for clear thinking. He mentioned five or six operations which were supposed to show how easily a process which he compared to the transmutation of metals in the imagination of the alchemist could be performed if they had the mind to do it. One was the application of the blue-water principle to the abolition of the forts on the Surrey hills. In April last year, however, he had explained to the House the arrangments at Portsmouth, Chatham, and Sheerness in substitution for the defences abandoned in Surrey. Only a small remnant of tools remained in the fort which the right hon. Gentleman saw, because they were more conveniently stored there than anywhere else; and the whole cost of the fort was the cost of a caretaker. As a perfectly natural consequence of this new policy, the whole of the scheme of the defence of London was abandoned more than a year ago, and abandoned with the assent of the House.

MR. HALDANE said the fort was full of valuable stores, which were being supplied from week to week. He found new axes had been sent down only the week before his visit. He saw 3,300 Lyddite shells and things of that kind. He did not say it as a reproach, but the forts were full of stores, and were being kept up.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said the only reason these forts were kept up was simply that they might be storehouses. If the right hon. Gentleman doubted that he offered to read the statement he had made to the last Parliament as to the orders given.

MR. HALDANE did not doubt that the statement was made; he might doubt whether it was carried out. He certainly saw one of the forts himself in the condition he described, and inquiry of the Army Council confirmed him.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said that he really did not know to what the right hon. Gentleman referred. The renewal of armaments in the fortresses around the coast had been going on for three years. The date of the War Office action as to the removal of the garrison of St. Helena was November, 1904, and only 200 artillerymen were left there temporarily against the protest of the War Office at the special request of the Admiralty. The reconnaissance service, with which the late Chancellor of the Exchequer was twitted in a reference to Birmingham as the centre of England, was overhauled in May, 1904, and the work severely limited to certain work on the south-east and south-west coasts at the expense only of the out-of-pocket expenses of the officers. It was on entirely military grounds that a limited number were retained, and now he understood the right hon. Gentleman was going to stop their operations. He was unable to ascertain what was the extra expense, but in his opinion it was limited to £100, and he would like to know whether the engineer officers would continue to be employed in carrying out this service. Another example brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman was the Tidworth barracks, and he said they should not be there. Quite true; but in fairness it might be mentioned that last year he told the House that at the second meeting he attended at the War Office he gave orders to stop barrack construction, and in this way an expenditure of £1,500,000 was stopped. This style of barracks was most distasteful to recruits, and he decided that no more of them should be built. That was decided three years ago. Of the barracks which the right hon. Gentleman saw the foundations had been laid, and these were left. He did not wish to make too much of small matters, but it would not have been fair to the Committee not to have mentioned that action had already been taken, guided by those considerations that had influenced the right hon. Gentleman in his study of the problem. If the right hon. Gentleman would look at the record of the Defence Committee and of the Army Council he would find that the questions to which he had referred and he (Mr. Arnold-Forster) had endeavoured to explain, had, with scores of others, been considered, and were not the result of a sudden outburst of the clear thinking which had been alluded to. With regard to the Militia, he did not want the right hon. Gentleman to pledge himself, but he had told the Committee something that was calculated to cause considerable alarm. Two schemes, he said, were under consideration, and when he indicated a change by which the training of the Militia was to be made a means of relieving the poor rates he suggested what would certainly be the greatest possible mistake; it might be a good thing for the unemployed, but it would be one of the worst things possible for the Militia and the Army. If the men were being trained as members of the Army he could understand it, but if this system of winter training-was only to be used as an adjunct to the poor law administration it would be a great mistake. Another suggestion was to call out certain battalions for six months' training and for six weeks' subsequent training. The right hon. Gentleman had said that a man in the Militia was a civilian for eleven months and a soldier for one, and how was he going to make him a soldier for seven and a half months and a civilian for four and a half months? 35,000 recruits went into the Militia in 1904. Six months training on enlistment and six weeks subsequently, what proportion did that bear to the whole? It would be a third of the whole recruiting, and officers must be provided for the training of these men.

MR. HALDANE said it was not proposed to apply this generally. It was limited to twenty battalions and was for the purpose of finding out where, under local conditions, better recruits could be obtained.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said he was glad to hear that it would not be extended to the rest of the Militia. But did the right hon. Gentleman think the men could be trained by their own officers? Of these the senior officers could give a month to the duty; then there were a certain number of retired captains from the Army, some useful, some not; a certain number of officers who had failed to get into the Army and went from battalion to battalion in order to make an income; and the remainder would certainly not train for seven months. He believed the attempt would destroy the Militia. Did the Committee realise that in 1904 35,000 men went into the Militia and that 38,000 went out of it, that of the 35,000 who went into it 22,000 either deserted or went into the Line, and that 12,000 of those that were left were under the age of twenty and therefore unable to go into the Line? He believed that great harm would be done to the Militia and to the Line by attaching to the experiment the condition that a man should not enter the Line until after receiving military training. In many cases it would mean putting off passing into the Line for from ten to eighteen months. Of the men who entered the Line eighty per cent. never went into Militia training, and the expectation that these men would go into the Line after eighteen months in the Militia would not be realised. Such a system would destroy both the Line and the Militia. They would perpetuate a bad system, and make the one absolutely dependent on the other. Until they gave the Militia what it ought to have, namely, an independent territorial existence, they would always have these difficulties, which would only be aggravated by the proposals made. There was a misconception as to recruiting: it had not been a bad recruiting season.

The number of recruits in the past year had been 4,500 below that of the previous year, but that year had been the heaviest known in peace time and the medical regulations were not then in force. But they were in force last summer, and thousands of men were refused as medically unfit, while each recruit was ten times the value of a recruit under the previous system. When the figures were tested by the proportion of waste, it would be seen that a wise step had been taken. Recruiting had not been bad; there had been an ample supply of recruits if proper use were made of them. He was not in favour of keeping the system of linked battalions. It was idle to say that if the depôt training was substituted for linked battalion training the recruit should not get battalion training. A man having been in the depôt for six months was drafted into a battalion for fighting service. The Royal Navy and the Guards and the Royal Marines were recruited from depots. The right hon. Gentleman was again mistaken in supposing that the Marines were not taken until the age of twenty. They were taken at the age of eighteen, and the right hon. Gentleman was also mistaken in supposing that a recruit could not be trained in a depot in four or six months. The right hon. Gentleman was mistaken in supposing that they could not get a sufficient number of recruits at a suitable age for India. At present they were getting a larger number of recruits over the age of nineteen than were necessary to supply the waste of the Army in India.

He should like to tell the Committee what was the real essential difference between the linked battalion system and the depot system. In order to keep up the battalions abroad we had to supply the waste. The real waste of a battalion 900 strong serving abroad, taking the period of enlistment as nine years, was one-ninth every year. That proportion was diminished by extensions and increased by sickness, invaliding, death, and discharge. In order to supply that waste, about 130 men were required each year, and for the purpose of supplying those men we kept up at home a great barracks, a battalion 700 or 800 strong, with a colonel, two majors, eight captains, subalterns, and a band, as well as a depot with a permanent establishment of forty or fifty men. That was a wasteful plan. The waste of a battalion 900 strong could be supplied by sending out seventy men trained at a depot twice a year. If the right hon. Gentleman cut down the battalions and retained the linked battalion system he would find himself hopelessly at a loss for trained reserves for the Army. He believed that force of circumstances would be too much for the right hon. Gentleman. The training depots at Winchester, Caterham, and Newcastle were standing and interesting examples of the possibility of training men in depots. He believed the right hon. Gentleman had not pledged himself in this matter, and he was confident that when he came to study the facts, as he had seen and studied them, the inexorable logic of the situation would bring him to the same conclusion, and that they would have the abandonment of the linked battalion system and the substitution of the depot system for it. The right hon. Gentleman had another great constructive plan, but he did not trouble about it because he did not believe it would come to anything. He did not believe that an army of village Hampdens would be any good; they would be a perfect nuisance to everybody. He was not speaking of rifle clubs. The right hon. Gentleman had not let them into the secret; but he had seen enough of the proposal to understand what it meant. In addition to the Navy, the Army, the Militia, the Yeomanry, and the Volunteers, there was to be a force to be called out when they pleased, possibly on Saturday afternoons. They were not to have uniforms; they were to go to the national schools and be instructed by Volunteer sergeants. There was to be no battalion organisation; not even company organisation.

MR. HALDANE: I have no plan.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER said a great many people had, and he thought he had seen many schemes that the right hon. Gentleman had had before him. At all events, this was to be a new army [MINISTERIAL cries of "What army?"]—an army of village Hampdens. His belief was that the Volunteers would not look kindly on this army, which, so far as he could see, could only be constructed at their expense. He felt strongly that they were in danger of sacrificing quality to quantity, and that was the last thing they ought to do. His right hon. friend had not told them where he would get his officers from. He did not believe in the kind of officers of which the right hon. Gentleman spoke the other day, men who made war a bye-product of their daily business. As in the Navy so in the Army; the officer must be a specialised, highly trained individual. He saw no suggestion at all as to how they were going to get the officers. He trusted that in this matter the right hon. Gentleman would be firm. He hoped the Committee would not think him impertinent if he ventured to say that he believed that the more the right hon. Gentleman studied these problems, the more he realised their true nature, the more would he be convinced that there was only one clear, logical solution. Already they were coming within measurable distance of some of those things which he was not able to do but which he hoped were in sight. He was aware that there was a strong and growing opinion in some quarters in favour of the depot system, but there was an equally strong and growing opinion in favour of territorialising the Militia and taking them away from service to the Line. He believed they would eventually come nearer and nearer to the ideal which he had formed, and which he had tried to persuade the House to accept. He had confidence in the right hon. Gentleman, and he regarded him as standing between them and some of those fanciful schemes the whole tendency of which was to sacrifice quality to quantity.

* Mr. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis) said the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down took credit for having initiated many of the changes which the present Secretary for War was about to carry out. But what were the facts? If they took, for example, a case of St. Helena it would be found that the troops there were sent out by the last Government. They had heard a good deal about the "blue-water" school, but he was not so sure that that theory was fully understood. He thought it was a cardinal principle of that theory that we must rule out of consideration all ideas of our being defeated at sea. The view put forward by the "blue-water" school was that given by the Secretary of State for War, that only about 5,000 or 10,000 men could raid this country after evading the Navy. A certain number of steamers might evade the blockade. When they took a larger number, when they contemplated twenty funnels emitting smoke, it became practically impossible to evade the naval defence which we could put forth. To put it briefly, the blue-water school endeavoured to think in battleships, and regarded all expenditure from that point of view. When they talked about cutting down the defences he would remind them of a Return which was published in 1903–4, relating to the money spent by the War Office on passive defence and active defence. That Return showed that half the net Army Estimates were spent on coast defences, defence of naval bases and stationary forces, and that took no account of the enormous expenditure upon military works. That expenditure could easily be cut down, because it was governed by our policy of naval supremacy. If they estimated half the Army Estimates in battleships of the "Dreadnought" type, putting her life at twenty years, and including the cost of crew, repairs, coal and stores and everything else, they would find that the passive defence of the Army worked out at about fifty "Dreadnoughts," which they could keep in full commission and replace for the money now being spent on the passive defence of the country. To those who were asking for these coast defences he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give the same answer as was given to Bristol in 1797, when the cabinet said that if they wanted fortifications they must pay for them themselves. That was the only safe way. Another point to which attention had not been drawn was the enormous expansion of the British Empire, which threatened to outrun our military capacity. During the last twenty-one years thirty United Kingdoms in area had been added to the British Empire. He ventured to assert that if they spent too liberally on the Army it would inevitably lead them to economise on the Navy. The Stanhope Memorandum of 1891, elicited by the Hartington Commission, laid down everything in exactly the wrong order, opposite to the blue-water principles. The first thing it laid down as the purpose of the Army was the maintenance of civil order; the second, that it existed to prevent the invasion of these islands; the third, that it existed for the defence of the coasts and commerce; the fourth, that it was to provide drafts for India and the colonies; and the fifth, that it existed, subject to the foregoing purposes and to financial considerations, to provide a striking force. This showed the immense reversal of policy which was now going on, and which, he thought, would succeed in bringing about the economy they so much desired on the Liberal benches.

Mr. POWER (Waterford, E.) said the increase in the naval and military Estimates in recent years had been simply appalling. He doubted whether there had been a corresponding increase in efficiency. The report of the Financial Relations Commission showed that Ireland contributed more than its proper share of taxation, and therefore the growing expenditure on armaments was a matter to which the representatives of that country could not be indifferent. Even at the risk of making enemies, they had declared their abhorrence to some of the wars of aggression of which this expenditure was the consequence. Ireland was naturally proud of the horses it produced, and he wished to know what steps the War Office had taken, or intended to take, regarding the disease which was introduced after the South African war. This was a matter of national importance, for anything that interefered with the production and sale of horses in Ireland naturally affected the whole industry. At present the trade was absolutely dislocated. The disease was introduced by the negligence of the War Office, who sent diseased horses, which spread the disease all over the constituency he represented. He was anxious to know what steps were to be taken to stamp out the disease. They had indulged in a short-sighted policy in trying to cure these animals. If the animals had been slaughtered the people in the south of Ireland would not have been complaining now. He held that, instead of tinkering away as at present, the War Office should not stand on small technicalities in regard to the proportion of the cost of the slaughtered animals to be paid. He thought the War Office should pay the entire cost of the animals which it had been found necessary to slaughter in order to prevent the disease from spreading. He had no statistics at present as to what had been paid by the local authorities in his part of Ireland, but he knew that the ratepayers were already taxed to the tune of 8s. 6d. in the £1. This taxation was a grievance of which they had reason to complain. In equity and justice the cost should be paid by the War Office, and he commended the matter to the favourable consideration of the right hon. Gentleman. The disease was introduced by three Artillery horses in Waterford, and it had gone over the entire south of Ireland.

*MR. MORTON (Sutherland) said they knew that the Army and Navy were going to cost something like £66,000,000, the portion appertaining to the Army being about £30,000,000. He wished to know from the Secretary of State for War, whether that was all the Army was going to cost.

And, it being half-past Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his Report to the House.

Committee report progress; to sit again this evening.

EVENING SITTING.

(In the Committee.)

ARMY ESTIMATES 1906-7.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum not exceeding £10,220,000, be granted to His Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Pay, etc., of His Majestys' Army (including Army Reserve) at Home and Abroad (exclusive of India), which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1907."

Debate arising,

*MR. MORTON (continuing his speech) said that in ten years the cost of the Army had been doubled, although they were told by Lord Roberts that the condition of the Army now was no better than in 1899. Unless they could reduce expenditure generally, and that of the Army in particular, they could get none of those reforms which had been promised by the Liberal Party and which were desired by the country. He now intervened in the hope that the Government would before long take some steps to reduce this expenditure. What he wished to know was what was to be the total expenditure on the Army for the forthcoming year, because the Estimates, as they were told by Mr. Gibson Bowles in his pamphlet, never agreed with the total spent. In the year 1904–5, as Mr. Bowles pointed out, although the Estimate was £29,163,837, the total cost of the Army was £37,833,000. This year the Estimate was about £30,000,000, but in addition to that there were appropriations in aid over £3,000,000, and in the Civil Service Estimates a further £500,000 was provided for Army purposes, whilst there was a very large amount to be added under the Military Works Acts, which meant loans. Unless they knew what was going to be spent for the Army out of loans, it was impossible to get at the total cost. He congratulated the Secretary to the Admiralty upon the account which he had put before the House. That account did in fact show the total cost of the Navy, and he urged the Secretary of State for War to treat the Army Estimates in the same manner. He did not think it was necessary to move a reduction, but he contended that they were only doing their duty in calling attention to these matters before the money was voted and spent. The cost of the Army must be reduced, otherwise the Government could not carry out the reforms promised to the country. He would like the Committee to say, "There is £20,000,000, and you must carry on your Army with that; you will have no more." He was told that there were £3,000,000 or £4,000,000 wasted in the Army, and that by a little economy a good deal of money would be saved. He noticed in the Estimates a charge of £71,700 for chaplains and ministers, and a separate charge of £1,000 for a chaplain general, and £50 for his clerk. Why was not that amount of £1,050 put in with the £71,700? He supposed the reason was that that was waste and nothing was done for the money. It was for that reason he called attention to those items, and he had no doubt many similar items might be found in the Estimates. Taxation had now reached its limit, and the people could not find more money to carry out the reforms that were necessary for the well-being of the country. The money could only be found by saving. The Liberal Party had promised these reforms and they had promised large reductions in the cost of the Army in order to provide the money. What we wanted in this country was the settlement of disputes by arbitration, and that instead of spending money on Armies the Government should place themselves at the head of a league of peace and do away with these great armaments. Although everything connected with War was bad, it was necessary, he supposed, for us to keep an efficient Army, but he did not see why we should not have a good one at a much less cost. This country had been warned against this kind of expenditure. Lord Lytton had said—

> "Let England draw the moral and beware not only of wars which exhaust, but of Governments which impoverish. A waste of the public wealth is the most lasting of afflictions."

If the present expenditure of the Army was continued the exact state of things which Lord Lytton warned the country against would occur. Tacitus, who flourished about the year 90, also pointed a moral when he said—

> "The treasury which is drained by extravagance must be refilled by crime."

There appeared to have been a wicked Tory Party even in those early days. He contended that to spend money on the Army for mere fighting purposes when the money was wanted for the purposes of necessary reforms in this country was a crime against the community. What was wanted was a Liberal Party which would insist upon the Government's doing what was right, and upon their keeping their pledges, which they could not do if they went on in this extravagant manner. They would never be able to reduce Army expenditure until they got a House of Commons which would refuse to vote blindly whatever was put before them, but which, instead, would warn Ministers of the consequences of recklessly spending money in the way they were now doing. They did not go to the country for the mere purpose of changing one set of Ministers for another. The Liberals were placed in power in order to reduce expenditure and in order that the people of this country should be better served than before.

*Mr. O'SHEE (Waterford, W.) urged that inasmuch as the introduction of the disease epizootic lymphangitis into Ireland was entirely owing to the incompetence and negligence of the members of the Army Veterinary Department, the large area of that country affected was entitled to some compensation. This was a serious matter for Ireland, for the horse trade was of very great importance to a large area; and the introduction of the disease had caused a considerable money loss. The Waterford County Council had paid no less than £800 compensation under the Diseases of Animals Act, and the Waterford Agricultural Society had lost £350 in connection with the show, which was prohibited on account of the existence of the disease. He was told by the right hon. Member for South Dublin last session that there was no statutory power to enable a sum to be paid out of Imperial funds to compensate for the loss caused, but he found from an answer given by the Secretary of State last session that the War Office had paid small sums to officers who had lost their horses in consequence of the disease.

*Mr. VERNEY (Buckinghamshire, N.) said there was one point to which he desired to call attention—a point which seemed not to have been sufficiently mentioned during the debate. While a good deal had been said about economy, only one class of economy had occupied the attention of the Committee, the economy of saving money. There was another kind of economy even more important, and that was that the country should get value for the money spent. The smaller the Army the more important it was that the officers should be very highly trained. He spoke as a civilian, although he had served as a Volunteer at a public school and at the University and in the Yeomanry. He agreed with much that had been said as to the importance of economy as regarded saving, but he desired to add a few words as to the economy of efficiency. The total increase in the expenditure for their armies and navies during the past ten years by the four great military Powers of Europe—Russia, Germany, France and Italy—amounted to £27,000,000; whereas the increase in the cost of naval and military forces of the United Kingdom for the same period was £50,000,000. These figures were sufficient to show what an extremely serious problem had to be faced. In Clode's "Military Forces of the Crown" it was pointed out that the pay of officers in Line regiments had not been materially increased for more than a century. It had been said that officers received allowances for various requirements, such as furniture for their rooms and mess furniture, but, in fact, these allowances were allowances to the Government rather than to the officers. Timeo Danaos et dona ferentes, which might be interpreted by officers that they regard with a certain reasonable suspicion offers from the War Office to supply them with furniture on the hire system. In nineteen years an officer would have paid for the hire of his furniture double the sum originally paid for it by the Government, and it remained the property of the Government after an officer had paid for it twice over. Moreover any repairs needed were paid for by the officers themselves. That he called an Imperial hire system, and the Government made an uncommonly good thing out of it. He had no objection to the Government supplying furniture to officers, but they should not make a profit out of it. On the other hand, the private soldier and the non-commissioned officer had had very considerable increases in their pay during the past 100 years. The question directly connected with pay was education. In diplomacy proficiency in certain professional subjects was rewarded by an increase of pay. The same principle should be observed in the Army. He believed that there was no profession in this country where so little direct encouragement was given to the technical study of the higher branches as in the Army, and he thought that officers who showed a proficiency in these higher branches should receive a proportionate increase in their pay.

MR. BRACE (Glamorganshire, S.) said that he was not acquainted with linked battalions or other military matters, but he and his fellow Labour Members had been sent to Parliament on a distinct issue, viz., to protest against the enormous expenditure on the Army. It would not be consistent for his own dignity, or in accordance with the wishes of his constituents, if he did not make clear to the Committee his position on this matter. He thought the right hon. the Secretary for War might well reconsider the attitude he had taken up after the more than flattering comments which had been passed upon his splendid speeches by the Gentlemen on the Opposition benches. If there was anything in the world that would lead him to doubt that the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman was a good one, it would be the flattering manner in which it had been received by hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition benches. A start had been made on a wrong basis. The present year seemed to have been the basis taken, whereas it should have been, both as regarded the number of men and the expenditure of money, the year 1897. What was there in the situation to-day which would warrant this Committee in passing expenditure for an Army larger by 45,000 men than the Army of 1897? If ever there was a time in the history of Britain when the number of men in the Army could safely be reduced it was the present. The horizon was absolutely clear, thanks in a great measure to the good offices of the King, and of hon. Gentlemen who had made sacrifices in attempting to bring about a better understanding between nation and nation; and if the House of Commons was to carry out the demand of the country to reduce the expenditure on our military forces now was the opportunity to begin. He quite understood the difficulty of the present Secretary for War, who had to take over a bad legacy from the late Government; but they who had come to Parliament pledged to a policy of economy ought to have a declaration from the right hon. Gentleman that his policy was not to be based on the expenditure of the late Government, but on that of 1897. In 1897 the expenditure in the Army amounted to £19,500,000; in 1906 it had leapt up to £29,750,000. There was nothing to justify an increase of £10,250,070 in ten years. Now was the time to practice economy, when there were no complications with other countries. In a time of peace we seemed to be living on a war footing, and that ought not to be the case with a Government returned to power to pursue a policy of peace. The people of the country did not understand more than he did the technicalities of linked battalions and the blue-water school, but they did appreciate the fact that they were groaning under a burden of taxation, and they hoped that this Government would reduce military and naval expenditure to the fair and proper level. He wanted not to be only logical but consistent. War was to him an abomination, and his experience as a Labour leader had shown him the appalling effect of strikes. He was glad to say that at the last international workmen's congress which met in Belgium, a resolution, proposed and supported by the Labour leaders from Belgium, France, Germany, Austria and the United States, was unanimously passed, setting forth that all international disputes should be settled by arbitration rather than by war. It was in conformity with that policy that he maintained that no opportunity should be lost for reducing expenditure on the naval and military forces of the country.

*Mr. FELL (Great Yarmouth) said he knew that when a new Minister entered into office he found numerous engagements made by his predecessors which tied his hands to a large extent. If the large sum of £30,000,000 was to be spent on the Army, a larger number of men and more guns should be obtained than now. France had an Army of 525,000, Germany an Army of 600,000, Austria an Army of 350,000, yet the Army budget of all these countries was considerably less than ours. He did not suggest that with a volunteer Army we could compete with countries where conscription strictly prevailed. The greater pay which the English soldier received as compared with the continental soldier in no way accounted for the difference in the cost of the different armies. The English private soldier cost £96 per year, but the French soldier only cost £36, and he was just as well cared for, as well nurtured and as well clothed as the English private. Besides, for that money France had all her great fortresses and 3,000 cannons, while this country had only 600 or 700. A cannon must cost the same in France as in England, and the same also with a horse. It had always puzzled him how France with an Army expenditure of £26,000,000 could afford to have five times the number of cannons, three times the number of horses, and far more waggons and commissariat stores than we had in England. The Army both in Germany and Austria cost per man less than half the amount expended on the English Army, while their arms and equipments were infinitely greater. He hoped the Minister of War would give him some inkling of the sources of information on this matter, and especially on the extraordinary difference between the cost of our Army and that of the continental Armies. He had never been able to find it either in books or in speeches of previous War Ministers.

Mr. HALDANE said he wished to appeal to the Committee to come to a decision on the Question. The general policy of the Army had now been discussed for two days, and ample opportunities would be afforded later on for debate both on economy and efficiency. A few points were raised in the course of the discussion which he would endeavour to answer briefly. His hon. friend the Member for Sutherlandshire put a question as to Appropriations-in-Aid. These Appropriations-in-Aid were credited for services rendered; they therefore added nothing to what the Navy paid, or what the Navy got.

*Mr. MORTON said that that only covered a part of his point; there was an Appropriation-in-Aid of £1,000,000 received from the Colonies. That was money spent.

Mr. HALDANE: Yes; but it was not money spent by us.

*Mr. MORTON said it was money spent by us but received from the Colonies, Mr. HALDANE said that the hon. Member for Waterford had assumed that the only question at issue between the County Council of Waterford and the War Office was the amount of the claim upon the latter by the former for having, through its horses, imported into the country a South African disease. But it was a question whether the War Office had not a claim against the Waterford County Council for having infected through its lay horses the horses of the War Office.

Mr. POWER said he did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman was cognisant of the fact that the military authorities admitted that the disease was introduced into Waterford by the Army horses.

Mr. HALDANE said that the War Office made no admissions, and reserved all their rights. With regard to the pay of Army officers he agreed that it was too small, and he should like to do something for them; but standing mid-way between these claims and the demands for economy, he felt a little paralyzed.

Mr. MORTON said that the right hon. Gentleman had not explained why the Vote for the Chaplain General of the Forces was put into Vote 13.

Mr. HALDANE said the details were all in the accounts.

Lord BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley) thought the Secretary of State had risen unusually early, and he should like to ask a few questions.

*Mr. J. WARD (Stoke-on-Trent) asked whether he would be in order in moving that the Question be now put.

Lord BALCARRES condemned the scheme for the winter training of the Militia. The announcement on this subject had first been made to the House by the President of the Local Government Board, and it was made more as the contribution of the Government, and the sole contribution of the Government, towards the unemployed problem than as a contribution towards increasing the efficiency of the Militia. They were told that twenty selected battalions were to be drilled and trained during the winter. We were now getting towards the end of March and it would be of immense advantage to those concerned to know the names of the battalions. He thought it unwise to use barracks for this training were other arrangements possible, as the best possible training could only be under canvas. In camp it was said that increased attention would be given to musketry, but the conditions for training were surely better for that in summer than in winter.

Mr. WHITLEY (Halifax) rose to a point of order. Should not this come on under the Militia Vote?

*The CHAIRMAN: As a matter of convenience I should think it would be better that the matter should come on on the particular Vote of the Militia, but as this is a general discussion I cannot say the noble Lord is out of order.

Mr. J. Ward rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

ARMY ANNUAL BILL.

Ordered, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide, during twelve months, for the Discipline and Regulation of the Army; and that Mr. Secretary Haldane, Mr. Edmund Robertson, and Mr. Buchanan, do prepare and bring it in.

Mr. WYNDHAM moved the adjournment of the House. They had been discussing Vote 1 of the Army and it was generally understood that there was to be a general discussion covering the whole Army policy of the Government. When such an understanding was arrived at, it was in order that all Members should have an opportunity of expressing their views on Army policy as a whole. Of course opinions would differ as to the time which was necessary to cover so large a field, but about this there was no misunderstanding, that it was clearly understood that after they had to the best of their ability assisted the Committee by giving their views on the military policy of the country as a whole, then they should take the Report stage of the Votes for the Navy. Some of his right hon. friends were responsible for the Navy Estimates, and the Opposition had no occasion to criticise the Naval policy of the present Government. Having enjoyed as far as was permitted them the opportunity of reviewing the military policy of the Government, they thought the House ought now to adjourn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn." —(Mr. Wyndham.)

Mr. HALDANE said that the only question in which discussion was interrupted was the Militia and that would come up again on the Militia Vote. He was very sorry that right hon. Gentlemen opposite should feel aggrieved. The right hon. Gentleman was very good in meeting the Government in the mode in which the discussion was taken, and he was quite prepared to assent to the adjournment of the House on condition of his being permitted to introduce the Army Annual Bill. It was merely a matter of form.

Mr. WYNDHAM said he would consent to that course, it being understood that the adjournment would not be opposed, and that the introduction of the Army Annual Bill was merely formal.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.

"To provide, during Twelve Months, for the Discipline and Regulation of the Army," presented accordingly, and read the first time; to be read a second time to-morrow, and to be printed. [Bill 110.]

Motion made and Question, "That this House do now adjourn"—(Mr. George Whiteley)—put and agreed to.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Earl of CREWE): My Lords, in asking your Lordships to give a Second Reading to this Bill, I am glad to be able to state that it is not, at any rate in its main points, of a controversial character as between the two sides of the House. In fact, I believe I am right in saying that had the late Government remained in office the noble Marquess opposite (Lord Londonderry) would in all probability have introduced a similar if not a precisely identical Bill. Since, however, this proposed measure is the outcome of a considerable amount of discussion outside, and since also the subject is one which is of great interest to several classes of people in the country, and in no small degree to the public at large, it will be right, I think, that I should explain as briefly as I can the details of the Bill to your Lordships.

The first clause deals with the schedule of poisons. At present the sale of poisons is governed by the Pharmacy Act of 1868, which contains a schedule; but as science has advanced, and the lessons of experience have been learned, various additions have been made to that schedule by Order in Council. Those additions are now incorporated in the Bill, and one or two further additions, as your Lordships will see, are proposed.

Clause 2 deals with a very important matter. There has been for some time past a strong demand on the part of the agricultural and horticultural interests for some extension in facilities for the sale of poisonous substances used by them in their business. Last year, I think, the then Minister for Agriculture, Mr. Fellowes, received a deputation which urged upon him increased facilities for the sale of poisonous substances of that kind. In October last, at a meeting of the Chamber of Agriculture of Scotland—of course a very important body—a resolution was passed making a similar request; and I have no doubt that the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees will bear me out in saying that when he was at the Board of Agriculture similar demands were frequently made. It is proposed, therefore, that local authorities should have power to give licences to traders who are not chemists under certain circumstances to sell these articles. It is not, however, intended in any way to supersede the ordinary business of chemists in this matter, and it is only in districts where there are no chemists' shops that, as a rule, it is proposed that these powers should be given.

The article which, perhaps, will be more affected than any by this provision is sheep dip, which, as your Lordships are aware, is as a rule of a very poisonous character. The most popular and generally-used sheep dip contains a very large amount of arsenic. A large sheep farmer will probably use several hundredweight of arsenic in the course of the year; and it has been found, particularly, for instance, in remote districts in Scotland, that sheep farmers have sustained no small inconvenience through having to send a great distance to secure the raw materials of sheep dip, and it is hoped that by giving licences to tradesmen who are not chemists to sell them, the convenience of sheep farmers will be greatly added to. Then I may also remind your Lordships of the great extension of spraying with various poisons for the destruction of insect and fungus enemies of different crops and plants which has taken place, and horticulturists will no doubt find a similar convenience in this provision.

I believe some objection has been raised, though I do not know whether it is now pressed, to the inclusion of arsenic in the substances thus to be sold. But arsenic has the dignity of having an Act of Parliament all to itself, by which its sale is regulated, and that Act contains the provision that arsenic sold for horticultural purposes has to be coloured in a different way, so that it can be distinguished from other substances, and that the danger of using it may be minimised. It is a more or less essential part of this clause that arsenic should be retained among the substances thus to be sold. The draft regulations which it is proposed to make by Order in Council under this clause are already prepared, and it would probably be for the convenience of those interested in this subject—the Pharmaceutical Society and others—if those regulations are promptly laid on the Table, and therefore I propose to do that on an early date.

The third clause of the Bill deals with an entirely different subject. It deals with a matter which is of interest to the Pharmaceutical Society, and also one in which an alteration is, we think, required for the protection of the public. Its effect is that any person who carries on the business of a chemist in more than one shop shall, on premises which he does not look after himself, he being, of course, a registered chemist, appoint in each case a registered chemist to look after the business. That is a provision which we consider is required for the protection of the public. I daresay your Lordships may remember that in the famous case of Bardell and Pickwick there was a juryman who, having unsuccessfully pleaded to be released from performing his duty, explained that he had left behind in charge of his shop an errand boy who, although a very nice boy, was thoroughly unacquainted with drugs, and the prevailing impression on his mind was that Epsom salts was oxalic acid, and syrup of senna was laudanum. That is, no doubt, an extreme instance, but I mention it to show how important it is that all dispensing of drugs, and the general management of the business of a chemist in every shop, should be conducted by a thoroughly qualified person.

Clause 4 deals with a question which has given rise to a certain amount of controversy. As I daresay your Lordships know, in the poorer districts of the great towns particularly, chemists' shops are very largely carried on by companies. A demand at one time was made—and I think it is hardly possible that that demand could be seriously pressed, because it is one which it would be quite impossible to meet—that everybody having an interest in a company of that kind should of necessity be a qualified chemist. That demand, as I say, is an entirely impossible one to meet. It is of no interest to the public to know how a chemist's shop is financed; but it is of the greatest importance to know how it is managed; and this clause provides that in any case where chemists' shops are carried on by a company there must be bona fide management by a qualified person, whose name shall be conspicuously placed in the shop, and in order to prevent any infraction of this provieion, further words propose to enact that any breach of that regulation shall not merely be visited on the unqualified person who may be managing the shop, but on the company itself. That, it appears to me, is an exceedingly important provision. It is one to which, in fairness, no objection can be taken, and it is one which I hope will be carried without difficulty.

I may say, at the same time, that it is not at all the intention of His Majesty's Government to interfere in any way with the carrying on of these companies' shops. I have no doubt they do supply a want. Fears have been expressed that if these companies and their shops are interfered with the poor will not be able to obtain a proper supply of cheap drugs. How far cheap drugs are an unmixed benefit to the poor, or to any one else, may be a matter of opinion. I remember it used to be said a few years ago of the two principal consulting doctors then in London that they differed only in this that one had lost all faith in every drug, whereas the other retained some slight glimmering belief in two or three drugs. Consequently I do not know that access to very cheap drugs need be regarded as an unmixed blessing to the poor. But still, if they want them it is perfectly right that they should be able to have them without any interference. We do not intend to interfere with the provision of cheap drugs of this class.

The next clause—Clause 5, gives certain powers to the Pharmaceutical Society: in the first place, by making it more easy for them to carry out their examination; and secondly,—and I think this is a useful provision—by enabling them to recognise colonial diplomas without further examination in this country. The sixth clause makes a certain change with regard to the sale of the more important and best known mineral acids which, as your Lordships know, are very largely used in many branches of commerce and manufacture. It proposes to enact, not that their sale should be restricted so far as concerns persons by whom they are to be sold, but that precautions of the well-known kind with regard to the marking and nature of the bottle or vessel in which they are contained should be carried out, as though they were poisons included in the schedule.

The seventh, which is the last operative clause, deals with the application of the Bill to Ireland. I do not know that at this stage of the measure it is necessary to explain the rather complicated manner in which this Bill is to be applied to Ireland. I fancy one or two points are raised upon it, but probably it would be more convenient if they were dealt with in Committee than at the present stage of the Bill. I will consequently, therefore, merely ask your Lordships at this stage to give the Bill a Second Reading.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2ª.—(The Earl of Crewe.)

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: My Lords, I entirely associate myself with what fell from the noble Earl the Lord President of the Council when he expressed his belief that there would be no objection in your Lordships' House to the principle of this Bill. I, on my part, certainly have no reason to object to it in principle. I really only rise to follow on the last words spoken by the noble Earl with reference to Clause 7 of the Bill; and, as he has expressed the opinion that it would be better to defer the discussion of the application of this Bill to Ireland until a later stage, I will postpone what I have to say. But I should like to remind the House that we in Ireland already have a system which we believe carries out the objects which prompted the Government to bring forward this Bill for England and Scotland. I am speaking after consultation with the Pharmaceutical Society of Ireland, and I can inform your Lordships that we do not think it necessary that this Bill should apply to Ireland at all, and therefore I formally give notice that in Committee I shall move an Amendment omitting the application of the Bill to Ireland. I am authorised to say, on behalf of the Pharmaceutical Society of Ireland, who were not called upon to give evidence before the Departmental Committee on whose Report this Bill is founded, that they would be very glad if they might be allowed to state their views to His Majesty's Government.

LORD MONKSWELL: My Lords: I have been asked by the President of the Pharmaceutical Society to say one or two words on this Bill. The Pharmaceutical Society is the authority to administer the Pharmacy Act of 1868, and what I have to say is this. The Pharmaceutical Society welcome many of the provisions of this Bill, and on the whole think it a good Bill. As your Lordships, I daresay, know, there is another Bill before the other House of Parliament which was brought in by the Pharmaceutical Society, and that Bill is, to some extent, on all fours with this one. But the Pharmaceutical Society would desire that an Amendment should be introduced in clause 4 making it a little more stringent than it is. I venture, on behalf of the society, to express the hope that His Majesty's Government will consult their President, before the Bill goes into Committee, with regard to any Amendments that may be proposed or set down.

THE MARQUESS OF LONDONDERRY: My Lords; I should not have trespassed on your Lordships' indulgence had I not been personally alluded to by my successor, the present Lord President of the Council. When I occupied that position this question was very carefully considered, and after consultation with the Board of Agriculture we placed on the stocks, if I may use that expression, a Bill somewhat similar to the one which the noble Earl has now introduced. I entirely agree with him that this is a non-controversial matter. We are all anxious that poisonous drugs should be sold with a maximum of convenience and the minimum of danger. Having studied this Bill while Lord President of the Council, together with the Board of Agriculture, I endorse what has fallen from my noble friend behind me (Lord Donoughmore), and I hope the noble Earl the Lord President will consult the various bodies interested before the Bill enters on its later stages. My noble friend Lord Donoughmore has stated with great truth that there is a feeling on the part of the Pharmaceutical Society of Ireland that this Bill should not extend to that country. The noble Earl, when we go into Committee, will explain how Ireland is differently legislated for by the Act of 1890, which enables people in the poorer parts of Ireland, by passing a slight examination, to sell drugs. I would ask the noble Earl in charge of the Bill to consult the Pharmaceutical Society in Dublin, and I think he will find that, while they agree that such a measure is necessary for the United Kingdom, they regard it as unnecessary and even dangerous to extend it to Ireland. So far as I am concerned, I shall certainly do all in my power to assist in the carrying of the measure as applied to the United Kingdom.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: My Lords, I am certainly not disposed to say anything against the Bill as it stands. I take no part in the question raised by my noble friend behind me (Lord Donoughmore), for I do not know exactly what the state of things is. But I must point out that it is a mis-description to describe the Bill as reversing a decision of the courts.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: It is only so described in the Memorandum attached to the Bill.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: That is so. No court, I think, has entertained any doubt that the decision there referred to was right. I tried to put it right in the sense that this Bill does, by calling upon persons who sold drugs of that sort to be properly qualified, and I think the court justly held that a company could not be examined for a certificate, and therefore could not be within the Act. I thought that was a mistake that ought to be remedied, and I brought in a Bill for the purpose. A great cry was raised at the time—so much so that I had to withdraw the clause in order that the Bill might be sent to the other House. The cry was raised on the ground that the noble Lord himself has suggested—namely, the difficulty of poor people obtaining drugs as they desired.

I only wish to make one further observation. I think the whole question is much more difficult and complex than appears on the face of this Bill. It is perfectly certain that a very large number of poisons can be sold; you cannot get them at a chemist's without a proper prescription from a medical man, but if you go next door, it may be to a drysalter, you can get any amount of deadly poisons, and the law at present has left it absolutely without any kind of protection, because the poisons are not sold in the character of medicines and medical preparations, but under popular names. I cannot help thinking that one of these days the question must be dealt with at greater length and with more precision than is the case in this Bill. I do not say that by way of criticising this Bill, but merely as a caution that when we have passed this measure we shall not have completed all that is desired. At the same time I give my support to this Bill.

*THE EARL OF CREWE: My Lords, I certainly have no complaint to make of the manner in which this Bill has been received on both sides of your Lordships' House. As regards the question raised by the noble Marquess opposite (Lord Londonderry), I can assure him that I shall be very happy indeed to consult the Pharmaceutical Society of Ireland, and to give weight to any representations they may make. I can assure my noble friend Lord Monkswell equally that I shall have pleasure in talking over the provisions of the Bill with the representative of the Pharmaceutical Society of England, and with other gentlemen who, I believe, wish to see me on the subject. As regards what fell just now from the noble and learned Earl, the late Lord Chancellor, I confess that personally I am in very general agreement with him in the belief that all measures of this kind are only of a distinctly partial character as regards the possibility of danger to the public from the sale of deleterious articles. But, as he, I understand, agrees, that is a very large question indeed, and hardly comes under the head of a Poisons and Pharmacy Bill in the technical sense. And therefore, although I think it is well worthy of consideration whether some larger measure might not be brought in, I am afraid it is hardly possible to attempt to include provisions of that kind in the present measure.

On Question, Bill read 2ª and committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

THE CARRYING OF DECK-LOADS.

LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, I beg to ask His Majesty's Government whether they have acted on opinions expressed in this House that negotiations should be opened up with foreign maritime Powers with a view to the general prevention of merchant vessels carrying deck-loads in the winter time, and, if so, whether these negotiations have been of any avail in checking further loss of life at sea through deck-loads.

*THE EARL OF GRANARD: My Lords, this subject has been before your Lordships' House for the last two years. In March, 1905, the late President of the Board of Trade, Lord Salisbury, promised to send a circular letter to the different maritime Powers asking them whether they would be disposed to consider some international arrangement by which the rules as to carrying deck-loads might be brought into line for all countries. This circular was sent out on April 18th last year, but I am sorry to say that the replies received have not been very satisfactory. The various maritime Powers were asked to co-operate, and three Powers—France, Germany, and Sweden—have not as yet answered the circular at all. The other Powers do not at present see their way to fall in with the suggestions contained in the note. I am afraid that from this it will be seen that the noble Lord can look forward to very little help from foreign Powers.

LORD MUSKERRY then put to His Majesty's Government the second Question standing in his name on the Paper, viz., whether it is a fact that the British steamer "Petunia" has lately crossed the Atlantic with a large deck-cargo of timber between the time limits when the carriage of such deck-loads to the United Kingdom is expressly forbidden by the Merchant Shipping Act; whether the "Petunia" was evading or intending to evade the law by carrying the deck-load to the Continent and returning to the United Kingdom to discharge the remainder of her cargo; whether the voyage of the "Petunia" was of a very protracted character, during which the deck-cargo broke adrift, and the ship sustained serious damage thereby; and what action, if any, was taken by the Board of Trade when the "Petunia" put into a port in the United Kingdom in distress.

The noble Lord said: The "Petunia," it appears, adopted the usual custom of evading the law by carrying to the Continent a dangerous deck-load of timber which she would not be allowed to bring to the United Kingdom. The "Petunia" met with injuries, I strongly suspect through carrying this dangerous deck-load, and was compelled to put into Falmouth. I am only going by the account which appeared in the Press at the time. I am hoping that my noble friend who represents the Board of Trade will be able to give us fuller information on the subject. When the "Petunia" got into Falmouth it was found necessary to shift the cargo in order to remedy the injury. The Marine Department of the Board of Trade, according to the Press, would not allow this, and eventually the "Petunia" with a dangerous deck-load and her injury unrepaired, had to proceed on her voyage. Last year, if I remember aright, a vessel, not damaged but with a dangerous deck-load, called at Glasgow. She discharged one log of the deck cargo, and the captain was heavily fined. Now, my Lords, I think that in the case of the "Petunia" the Board of Trade should have allowed the cargo to have been shifted and discharged, and then have fined the owner, not the captain. It is always the case that the unfortunate captain gets fined for what he cannot help. The captain must take a dangerous deck-load or be dismissed from his ship. I think that the action of the Board of Trade in allowing this vessel to proceed to sea in a disabled condition was very wrong indeed. I beg to put the Question.

*THE EARL OF GRANARD: My Lords, I feel that it is necessary to give your Lordships a short history of the subject under discussion before I actually deal with the special case of the steamship "Petunia." In 1903 the noble Lord called attention in this House to the carriage of deck cargoes to ports on the Continent during winter, and proposed that the provisions of Section 451 of the Merchant Shipping Act, which prohibits such a practice in the case of vessels coming to a port in the United Kingdom, should be extended to those trading to Continental ports. The noble Lord had already previously raised the question in 1901, and in 1904 he introduced a Bill to give effect to his views. A similar measure which was introduced in 1905 was also not proceeded with.

The number of lives lost in timber-laden vessels belonging to the United Kingdom which foundered or were missing, or suffered deck damage or loss of deck load, during the thirty-three years and ten weeks ended March 12th, 1906, was 1,747, of which 1,291 were lost in the sixteen years ended 1888, and only 456 were lost in the seventeen years and ten weeks ended March 12th, 1906. The annual average loss in the first period of sixteen years was eighty, in the second period of seventeen years it was twenty-seven, and in the whole period of thirty-three years it was fifty-three. No loss of life in timber-laden vessels has been reported in the first ten weeks of 1906. Of the 1,747 lives lost, 1,482 were lost in sailing ships and only 265 in steamers. During the year 1905 only three casualties to vessels carrying timber were attended with loss of life, viz., s.s. "Freshfield," which left Norfolk, Virginia, for Hamburg on February 7th, 1905, with twenty-five crew and a cargo of timber, and has not since been heard of; s.s. "Castano," which lost one of her crew and part of her deck-load on April 11th, 1905, on a voyage from Newport News to Bordeaux; and s.s. "Pydna," which lost one of her crew and part of her deck-load on June 1st, 1905, on a voyage from Miramichi to Manchester. Neither of these three vessels came under the Act. The casualty to the "Pydna" is the only fatal one that has occurred to a vessel carrying timber since May, 1905, when the question of deck-loads was last debated in the House. Omitting missing vessels, the causes of whose loss are unknown, the total number of lives lost from timber-laden vessels by casualties to which deck-loads could contribute since 1899 was eight or 1·3 per annum.

I will now deal with the case of the "Petunia." It is the fact that this steamer recently crossed the Atlantic with a deck-cargo of timber between the time limits mentioned in Section 451 of the Merchant Shipping Act, when the carriage of such loads is prohibited. She was on a voyage from America to Bordeaux, where the deck-cargo was landed, and she then made for Dublin, where the remainder of her cargo was discharged. As no deck-cargo was brought to this country there was no infringement or even evasion of the law prohibiting deck-cargoes. It is also true that the voyage was a protracted one and that the deck cargo broke away, the ship losing her propeller. She then put into Falmouth for repairs, where she was at once visited by a Board of Trade surveyor. Some of the cargo was discharged in order to get at the spare propeller. This cargo was re-shipped after a new propeller had been fitted, in the presence and to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade surveyor.

The noble Lord appears to wish to penalise a British ship carrying a deck-cargo to a foreign port. If this were done we could not equally penalise the foreigner, and therefore we should be forcing our own people to carry on the keen competition in which they are engaged at a severe disadvantage as compared with the foreigner. British and foreign ships coming to this country are, of course, on equal terms, and at the present moment they trade to foreign ports also on equal terms. The Board of Trade have received from the owners of the "Petunia" a full and satisfactory account of the whole voyage of this vessel, and are perfectly satisfied that no contravention or evasion of the law occurred. The Board are further satisfied that the whole question of deck-loads is receiving the careful attention of shipowners in this country and abroad. The loss of life shows a distinct tendency to diminish, and His Majesty's Government have no intention of imposing upon British shipowners without very strong reasons, which do not at present exist, any further restrictions in this matter, especially as they would have no power to impose these restrictions on their foreign competitors.

BRITISH TRADE AND METHODS.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS rose to ask His Majesty's Government if they would lay on the Table of the House Sir Alfred Bateman's deductions from 171 Consular Reports as to our trade and methods.

Blue-books 1898 and 1902. The noble Earl said: My Lords, I shall trouble your Lordships with very few words in support of the Notice which stands in my name. I have been asked whether I intended to raise a fiscal debate. On the contrary, I hope I shall say nothing which can by any possibility raise such a discussion. When the Duke of Devonshire brought the fiscal question before your Lordships and moved for a Return of trade during the last three years, I asked him to move also for this document, but I received an answer to the effect that, though the noble Duke thought it would be very useful to have Sir Alfred Bateman's deductions, he would rather not mix the two things together.

What I want is that you should know what was, up to a certain time before the fiscal controversy arose, the opinion of the experts at the Board of Trade as to the state of our trade, as to how far it was prospering, and the reasons why it did not progress as it ought to. Sir Alfred Bateman's Report would not occupy more than half a sheet of letter paper. I will not trouble your Lordships by reading the six reasons given by Sir Alfred Bateman for British trade not progressing as it ought to do, but I would lay special emphasis on one of those reasons. The sixth reason given by Sir Alfred Bateman is as follows—

> "The development of technical education in Germany and the greater attention paid in schools to modern languages, added to the system of sending young Germans all over the world to acquire a practical knowledge of the languages, business habits, etc., of other countries, by means of which they are afterwards able to compete with those countries with a greater chance of success."

This, my Lords, is confirmed by my own recent experience. My house was under repair, and I had to go to a London hotel. There was a very nice young German waiter there, and I entered into conversation with him. He spoke English perfectly. I said, "Do you speak French"? and he replied that he did. I then asked him if he spoke Italian, and he replied, "A little," adding that he was leaving London in a few months to go to Milan to learn Italian. I asked him how many waiters there were in the hotel, and he replied, "Eight." I then asked how many of them were Germans, and his answer was "alle," "everyone." I said, although I knew better, that I assumed, of course, that in Berlin there was no end of Englishmen who were waiters, and he replied, "keine," "not one." To a further question, as to whether that was the case all over the world, his reply was, "Yes." That, my Lords, is an instance of the way our trade suffers. Young men in this country play football with their heads; they do not take the trouble to educate themselves properly.

I hold in my hand a little book, a reprint from an article that appeared in June in the National Review, which has vitriolic truth in every line of it. It is by a German resident in England, who is a great employer of labour. He confirms what I have just said as regards the action of Germany. As an employer of labour he found that in this country men he employed had not heard of Nelson, and when they were asked where Hong Kong was they replied that it was in the Mediterranean. I venture to think that is a state of things which it would be well to look into, and it is in that sense that I ask His Majesty's Government to lay this Report on the Table. Sir Alfred Bateman's Report contains deductions from 171 Consular Reports which he had to analyse and "boil down." The Report is one of great importance, and I hope His Majesty's Government will consent to lay it on the Table.

*THE EARL OF GRANARD: My Lords, the noble Earl has asked His Majesty's Government whether they are prepared to publish as a separate Paper the Memorandum contained in Blue-book Cd. 9078 of 1898. I regret that it will not be in our power to do so. The Blue-book is still in circulation and can be obtained for the sum of 10½d.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Think of its weight!

*THE EARL OF GRANARD: I cannot think that any useful purpose would be served by reprinting a part of it. The Blue-book referred to is now six years old, and the experience of the Department which I represent in this House is against publishing literature of the kind broadcast. It has been decided by the Department not to publish in future Reports of the kind, as the suggestions contained therein become available for foreign competitors as well as for British traders, and may possibly damage the reputation of British goods. Instructions have consequently been issued to His Majesty's Consular officers to embody suggestions as to possible improvements in British trading methods in separate despatches, the contents of which are brought confidentially to the notice of large firms, and Chambers of Commerce, or published at the discretion of the Board of Trade.

The Earl of WEMYSS: I may, perhaps, just say that the defects in our methods of trading are much better known abroad than in this country. As His Majesty's Government decline to publish the Paper I have asked for, I shall print and circulate it at my own expense, as I did in the case of the Duke of Wellington's letter, and I hope to have it in your Lordships' hands by the end of the week.

FLEETS (GREAT BRITAIN AND FOREIGN COUNTRIES).

On Sir CHARLES DILKE'S moving for a Return showing the Fleets of Great Britain, France, Russia, Germany, Italy, United States of America, and Japan, on the 31st day of March, 1906, distinguishing:—Battleships, built and building; cruisers, built and building; coast defence vessels, built and building; torpedo vessels, torpedo boat destroyers, torpedo boats, and submarines, built and building. Return to show date of launch, displacement, and armaments reduced to one common scale (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 96, of Session 1905),

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD (Liverpool, West Derby): I object.

MR. SPEAKER: The Ayes have it.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD: May I ask, Sir, if it is not competent for anyone who thinks it injudicious that a Return of this character should be granted, to object?

*MR. SPEAKER: The granting of a Return is a matter which rests with the Department concerned. If the Department agrees it is an unopposed Return.

Return ordered, "showing the Fleets of Great Britain, France, Russia, Germany, Italy, United States of America, and Japan, on the 31st day of March, 1906, distinguishing battleships, built and building; cruisers, built and building; coast defence vessels, built and building; torpedo vessels, torpedo boat destroyers, torpedo boats, and submarines, built and building."

"Return to show date of launch, displacement, and armaments reduced to one common scale (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 96, of Session 1905)."—(Sir Charles Dilke.)

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS CIRCULATED WITH THE VOTES.

Dublin Post Office Staff.

MR. NANNETTI (Dublin, College Green): To ask the Postmaster-General if he is aware that, when on his defence in the Corcoran defalcation case some years ago, the controller of the Dublin sorting office stated that he had not a man on his staff capable of filling the higher positions in his office; and will he lay upon the Table of the House any statements then made by the controller which were reflecting upon the staff under his charge, and which may still be operating against their chances of advancement or promotion.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The Reports and statements in the Corcoran case were fully considered at the time, and I can see no good purpose in reopening the matter after a lapse of five years.

Post Office Committee—Position of Sub-Postmasters.

MR. HUGH LAW (Donegal, W.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether the position of sub-postmasters is to be inquired into by the Committee on Post Office Servants.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) Yes, Sir. The Committee is asked to report on the remuneration of sub-postmasters.

Postal Facilities at Burtonport, County Donegal.

MR. HUGH LAW: To ask the Postmaster-General whether he can see his way to arrange for an evening delivery of letters at Burtonport, county Donegal; and also for an outgoing mail service in connection with the train leaving Londonderry at four p.m. via Larne.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) Inquiry is being made on this subject, and I will send the honourable Member a reply as soon as it is completed.

United States Tariffs.

MR. TORRANCE (Glasgow, Central): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the United States Government have passed a Tariff Bill prejudicing the interest of British shippers of cotton textiles; and whether, in view of the Treaty of Paris, signed with Spain in 1899, he is taking steps to cable our representative in Washington to protest against the Bill being put into operation.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) The measure to which the hon. Member no doubt refers proposes to increase the duty upon a certain class of cotton goods imported into the Philippines. The change of tariff classification would apparently apply to imports from all countries, and would not infringe any treaty rights.

Russia and Immigrants excluded from Great Britain.

SIR W. EVANS GORDON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any official denial from the Russian Government that immigrants who were refused admission to this country under the provisions of the Aliens Act were executed without trial on their return home.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) No official Report of such executions having taken place has reached His Majesty's Government, and there has therefore been no question of an official denial by the Russian Government.

Preferential Treatment of German Shipping at Buenos Ayres.

MR. HOUSTON (Liverpool, West Toxteth): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that German and other steamers under foreign flags receive preference, in entering the docks at Buenos Ayres, and obtaining discharging berths, over English steamers, and that recently the German steamer "Pontos," although not in port, was given special permission to enter the docks, notwithstanding the late special (Argentine) Government decrees, whilst many British steamers, already in port, were waiting for discharging berths; whether he has received any Report from the British Consul in this connection; and whether he will make representations to the Argentine Government that British vessels shall at least be treated on an equality with vessels of German and other nationalities.

(Answered by Secretary Sir Edward Grey.) A Report has been received from His Majesty's Consul respecting the congested state of the docks at Buenos Ayres, and His Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires was instructed to bring about an amelioration of the present state of affairs by such means as might be open to him. If the hon. Member will give me any further details he may have as to the alleged preferential treatment there of steamers under foreign flags, I will cause inquiry to be made. No cases of preferential treatment have been reported to us.

The Swaziland Protectorate.

SIR BRAMPTON GURDON (Norfolk, N.): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Swaziland is now regarded by His Majesty's Government as a Dependency of the Transvaal Colony, or as a Protectorate under the direct supervision of the Crown; and whether His Majesty's Government will make the situation clear to the Transvaal authorities and to the Swazi people.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The position of Swaziland is that of a Protectorate, administered by the Governor of the Transvaal Colony, which is responsible for the finances, under the provisions of the Order in Council of June 25th, 1903. See page 57 of House of Commons Return, No. 130, of Session 1905. The Government and Legislature of the Transvaal have not, as such, any authority in Swaziland. The Order in Council was published in the Transvaal and in Swaziland, and the Secretary of State has no doubt that the situation is clearly understood by the Transvaal authorities and by the Swazis, so far as the latter can understand the subtleties of British Constitutional Law.

Unskilled White Labour in Witwatersrand Mines before and after the introduction of Chinese.

MR. MOND (Chester): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can state what was the number of unskilled white workmen employed on the Witwatersrand mines before the arrival of the Chinese coolies; and what is the number of such unskilled white workmen at the present time.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The Secretary of State will telegraph for the information. The information asked for in the Return, for which the hon. Member moved on February 22nd, of the number of unskilled white men employed underground, has not yet been received.

Postal Facilities in Nairnshire.

MR. A. WILLIAMSON (Elgin, Nairn): To ask the Postmaster-General whether representations have been received, requesting increased postal facilities in Nairnshire; and whether he will authorise the establishment of a post office at the village of Little Mill, and a daily delivery of letters to all houses in the neighbourhood.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) An application has been received within the last few days for an improvement in the postal service in the neighbourhood of Little Mill. There has not, however, yet been sufficient time to make full inquiry on the subject, but I will send the hon. Member a reply in due course.

The Telephone Agreement.

MR. J. WILLIAMS BENN (Devonport): To ask the Postmaster-General whether it is the intention of the Government to place before the House the revised agreement, entered into by the Postmaster-General and the National Telephone Company, with respect to the purchase of the company's undertaking in 1911.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I have arranged to present to Parliament a copy of the supplemental agreement with the National Telephone Company of August 8th last, which was made in order to give effect to one of the recommendations of the Select Committee of last Session.

Appointments as Postmen for Telegraph Messengers and Ex-Soldiers and Sailors.

MR. DU CROS (Hastings): To ask the Postmaster-General whether the rule of giving postmen's appointments to senior telegraph messengers and ex-Army or Navy men in rotation is still in force in the provinces, and if the rule also applies to the allotting of substitute duties to cover postmen's vacancies, annual leave, and sick leave.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The Answer to the first part of the hon. Member's Question is in the affirmative. The rule does not apply to the allotting of substitutes.

Postal Servants' Associations.

MR. DU CROS: To ask the Postmaster-General whether the notice in the Post Office Circular, No. 1702, of February 13th, 1906, granting secretaries of the various postal organisations the right of making representations to the Postmaster-General, is to be regarded as an instruction to postmasters and surveyors to receive and consider communications from secretaries of branches of such organisations in their districts, relating to the service and affecting members of the class of which the branch of an association is representative; if not, will he issue instructions for this to be done, in order that the postal organisations may be fully recognised.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The secretaries of the branches of the various postal organisations are at liberty to make, to postmasters and surveyors, representations relating to the service and affecting the class of which the branch of an association is representative. In regard, however, to matters solely affecting an individual, and not his class or branch of the service, the appeal is to come from the individual himself.

Salaries of Bradford Education Officials.

Mr. ALFRED HUTTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Morley): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the Bradford City Council has declined to pay the annual increases in salary due to their officials in the education office, increases which arise under the scale and are part of the contract made by the defunct school board; and whether he proposes to take any action in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I am informed that, subject to certain exceptions, the Bradford City Council have not adopted the recommendations made to them by their education committee to advance the salaries of the official staff in accordance with a fixed scale. The scale I understand to be that upon which the officers were appointed or their salaries were fixed by the late school board. I have no authority to take action in the matter, but I learn from the town clerk that he has recently reported to the finance and general purposes committee of the council to the effect that, in his opinion, the officers are legally entitled to these fixed increases of salary. He adds that this opinion has not yet been considered by the education committee, or the council sitting as the education authority.

Unemployed Committees and Ex-Soldiers and Sailors.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Central Unemployed Committee for London on January 5th last requested, by letter to the Local Government Board, that such facilities as the employment register may afford for obtaining employment without outlay by the central body, be extended to ex-soldiers and ex-sailors within twelve months after completion of their term of service, even though, by reason of their service in the Army or in the Navy, they may not possess twelve months residential qualification, and that such soldiers and sailors were discharged with characters marked as good, and that they have resided for at least ninety days previous to their application for employment in the district served by the district committee concerned, provided that the Local Government Board consents to make a uniform regulation to this effect throughout the country; and whether he has acceded to this request by the issue of a regulation, or otherwise, applicable to the whole country, so that unemployment relief should be available for ex-soldiers and ex-sailors without involving a burden upon London ratepayers.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I have no power to make a regulation which would enable the central body to give assistance under the Unemployed Workmen Act to ex-soldiers and ex-sailors who do not possess the residential qualification prescribed by the Act. Legislation would be necessary for this purpose. Without any regulation these men can avail themselves of labour exchanges and distress committees, and their officers can afford them information as to vacant situations. I will address a communication to the central body on this subject.

Ventilation of Pimlico Army Clothing Factory.

Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Home Office can further press the War Office to communicate at once to the Home Office the plan of improved ventilation for the Pimlico Clothing Factory long promised and delayed.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) I have already written to the War Office asking what progress is being made.

Sir CHARLES DILKE: To ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he is now able to fix a date at which the Army Council will communicate to the Home Office the nature of the improved system of ventilation for the Pimlico Clothing Factory.

(Answered by Mr. Buchanan.) Every effort is being made to expedite the presentation of these plans, but I am unable at present to fix a definite date.

Visits of Women Inspectors to Pimlico Army Clothing Factory.

Sir CHARLES DILKE: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether His Majesty's women inspectors have free access to the Pimlico Clothing Factory; and whether he can arrange for more frequent visits.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) The Answer to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative. As regards the second part of the Question, there are no special grounds, I understand, part from the question of ventilation, which has already been the subject of inquiry by the Factory Department, for increased inspection of this factory, having regard to the heavy demands on a limited staff.

Famine Relief in India.

MR. T. HART-DAVIES (Hackney, N.): To ask the Secretary of State for India what are the total numbers of persons on famine relief works or obtaining gratuitous relief, and the numbers of such persons in the districts of Ajmere, Marwarra, Bijapur, Sholapur, and Belgaum, respectively; whether any village water-storage works, as distinguished from large irrigation schemes, have been constructed in those districts since the Irrigation Commission's Report was published; and whether the Agricultural Department has been able to promote to any appreciable extent the cultivation of drought-resisting plants suitable for providing cattle with fodder.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) According to the latest Returns, the number of persons on famine relief works or obtaining gratuitous relief in the five districts are, respectively, as follows:—

	On works.	Gratuitously relieved.	Total.
Ajmer - - - - - - -	22,671	1,223	23,894
Merwara - - - - -	23,923	2,626	26,549
Bijapur - - - - - -	1,697	4,125	5,822
Sholapur - - - - - -	951	303	1,254
Belgaum - - - - - -	3,385	3,316	6,701
Total - -	52,627	11,593	64,220

	On works.	Gratuitously relieved.	Total.

On the Commission's Report being published, the preparation of programmes of village works was taken in hand in these and other districts by the revenue authorities, the more important schemes in the programmes being referred for further examination to the Public Works Department. I am unable to say how many village works have actually been constructed. They are for the most part of limited public utility, and in ordinary times would not be executed from general revenues, but by private individuals, the village community, or the district board. In years of drought they form useful relief works, on which the State can find employment for the people. In the present season they are being so utilised. The agricultural departments in the several provinces are conducting experiments with a number of drought-resisting plants, but so far without marked success.

County Clare, Police Force.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, why the police prevented the fife and drum band of O'Callaghan's Mills playing on the 28th February; whether he can state why the number of police in this district of Clare has been increased recently; and why a large force was drafted into O'Callaghan's Mills on 11th March.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the Inspector-General that the police did not prevent the band in question from playing until it reached a point, at a considerable distance from O'Callaghan's Mill, where it was feared that intimidation might result. Several months ago, the police force at O'Callaghan's Mills and Broadford stations was increased by three and two men, respectively, because there had been signs of trouble in those districts. An extra force of six policemen, and no more, was sent to O'Callaghan's Mills on Sunday the 11th March in order to prevent a recurrence of disorderly conduct which had occurred in the village on the preceding Sunday.

The Royal Irish Constabulary.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG (Cavan, E.): To ask the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, if he can state the number of the Royal Irish Constabulary in active service in Ireland and the cost, and the number of pensioners and the cost; and whether the reduction of the force is contemplated.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I beg to refer the hon. Member to the Estimates for the coming year, which show that 9,978 officers and men are to be provided for the total net cost, exclusive of pensions and gratuities, being £923,862. The same Estimates show the present number of pensioners to be 7,736, and the amount of their pensions £379,676. A considerable reduction in the number and cost of the Royal Irish Constabulary has been effected in recent years. The question of further reducing the force has been and is under my consideration.

Prisoners in Irish Prisons.

MR. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the average aggregate number of prisoners detained in all Irish prisons during each of the last three years.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The average total number of prisoners confined in all Irish prisons, convict and local, during the last three years, was as follows:—In 1903, 2,557; 1904, 2,574; 1905, 2,605.

Irish Tenders for War Office Contracts.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether arrangements will be made to establish a depot in Dublin for the reception of samples arising from tenders of articles to be supplied to the Government Departments in Ireland.

(Answered by Mr. Buchanan.) It is understood that the hon. Member is desirous that patterns or samples should be exhibited in Dublin to guide firms in tendering for such articles as it may be decided to obtain locally for Army use. Samples of stores are available for inspection in Dublin for all articles which are tendered for delivery in Ireland.

Supply of Water for East Pier, Kingstown.

MR. FIELD: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will say how many days per week a family named Rice supplied the water to the Battery, East Pier, Kingstown, at 1s. 6d. per day; whether, seeing that they were prosecuted at the instance of the Kingstown Urban District Council for supplying water without payment, their services have been dispensed with; and if any compensation has been given.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) This family supplied the water three days a week at 1s. 6d. per 48 gallons per diem. Their services have been temporarily dispensed with, pending further action on the part of the district council. No compensation has been given to them.

Mr. FIELD: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the fresh water supplied to the East Pier Battery, Kingstown, is conveyed from Marlborough Barracks, Dublin, by the Army Service Corps in tanks drawn by two horses; and whether, seeing that water can be procured in Kingstown at a charge of £5 per annum, he will say whether anything is paid to the Dublin Corporation for the water; what is the cost per diem for two men, two horses, and cart to convey the water; whether any saving has been effected; and what is the distance from Marlborough Barracks to Kingstown.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The fresh water supplied to this battery is being so conveyed by the Army Service Corps. No expense is incurred thereby, as the two men, two horses, and cart so employed are engaged on ordinary Army Service Corps duties. Payment is being made to the Dublin Corporation for the water at the rate of 4d. per 1,000 gallons. A temporary saving has been effected by this mode of supply. The distance from the Royal Barracks to Kingstown is six miles. An arrangement has now been made by which water will be supplied from Kingstown to the battery.

Capacity of Ex-Soldiers to serve in Home Defence Army.

Mr. MOND: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state what is the number of men in the United Kingdom, whose age does not exceed forty-five, who have passed through the Army and Reserve, and no longer constitute any part of His Majesty's regular forces; and whether he can state what number of such men are physically capable of serving in a Home defence Army.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) No statistics are maintained of ex-soldiers, other than pensioners, who have passed through the Army and the Reserve. It is regretted, therefore, that it is not practicable to give my hon. friend the information he requires.

Prosecutions under the Education Act.

Mr. BARKER (Penrhyn and Falmouth): To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that prosecutions continue to be taken against persons holding conscientious objections to the Education Bill of the late Government; and whether he will cause steps to be taken to stop further prosecutions, pending the introduction of the Education Bill of the Government.

(Answered by Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman.) I am aware of the fact that prosecutions continue to be brought against persons holding conscientious objections to the Education Act of 1902, and I much regret it; but I do not see how the Government can interfere in the matter pending the introduction of the Education Bill.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Germany and the Welsh Coal Fields.

Mr. FELL (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has any official information as to the purchase by Germans of two more anthracite collieries in South Wales; and whether he will consider the advisability of introducing legislation to prevent the transfer of coal mines to foreigners, with a view to preserving supplies of coal necessary for the Royal Navy.

The SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Mr. Edmund Robertson, Dundee): I have nothing to add to the Answer given by the Prime Minister to the hon. Member for Mid Armagh yesterday.†

† See page 99.

MR. FELL: There was further information in this morning's paper.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is not entitled to make a statement.

Dartmouth Naval Cadets.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Admiralty will direct a ballot to be taken of the 418 cadets at the Royal Naval College, Osborne, and the new system cadets now at Dartmouth, in order to ascertain how many, if any, intend to volunteer for the engineering branch; and whether he will state the result to the House.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: It is not considered necessary to take the course suggested by my hon. friend.

MR. BELLAIRS asked how the right hon. Gentleman proposed to get over the disinclination of these boys to join the engineering branch.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I do not know that there is any such disinclination.

Tristan Da Cunha.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty what was the last occasion on which one of His Majesty's ships was despatched from the Cape to Tristan da Cunha, with mails and parcels for the islanders.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The last occasion was in January, 1904, when H.M.S. "Odin" carried out this service from the Cape.

MR. ASHLEY asked whether it was not a fact that a petition had been presented to the Governor of Cape Colony by relatives of the islanders asking that a ship might be sent at an early opportunity to enable them to communicate with the islanders.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON said he was not able to answer that Question.

Defence of the Mersey.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that, on Saturday, February 24th last, a preliminary practice of mobilisation for the defence of the Mersey was carried out under the direction of Colonel Kelly, R.E., and that four Volunteer battalions were extended on the two shores of the Mersey, and were under arms from 1.30 p.m. to 11.30 p.m., and that the whole of these troops were supplied with ball cartridge for the purpose of these manœuvres; and whether he will, in the future, take steps to prevent such a danger to the public.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. HALDANE, Haddington): It is considered that mobilisation practice in coast defence work should approximate as nearly as possible to service conditions. These conditions entail practice in drawing the necessary ammunition. Special instructions were issued to guard against any danger to the public. I think that the Volunteers may be trusted to prevent men firing ball cartridge indiscriminately and without orders.

Small Arms Factory.

MR. ABEL SMITH (Hertfordshire, Hertford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what orders are likely to be given to the sword and bayonet department of the small arms factory during the current financial year.

MR. HALDANE: The patterns of both sword and bayonet are under consideration, and no manufacture of existing patterns is contemplated pending decision.

MR. ABEL SMITH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War how many short rifles is it proposed to manufacture during the current financial year, and what proportion of that number will be allotted to the Enfield Small Arms Factory.

MR. HALDANE: The allocation of orders has not yet been settled.

West Indian Colonial Constitution.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether, in connection with recent labour troubles in the West Indies, his attention has been called to differences existing in various West Indian islands, between the Government and representatives of the population occupying elective situations; and whether the Colonial Office will consider the wisdom of taking steps to revise the existing constitutions of several of the West Indian colonies in the direction of greater recognition of the interests of the working majority of the population.

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): The recent labour troubles in Demerara, to which my right hon. friend presumably refers, were not the outcome of political differences; and, having regard to the peculiar racial conditions of the West Indies, His Majesty's Government are not satisfied that the extension of elective institutions would be likely to conduce to the prosperity or tranquillity of the population. The constitutions of the Colonies have been so frequently, and in some cases, so recently revised, that it is not considered expedient to undertake further experimental changes at present unless special occasion should arise.

Re-enlistment of Chinese Coolies.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether re-enlistment for a further period of three years of Chinese coolies, now engaged under the Transvaal Labour Ordinance, will, under any circumstances, be possible, if responsible self-government be granted before the first batch of licences expire in May, 1907; and whether re-enlistment will be possible in the case of licences expiring before responsible self-government be set up.

*MR. CHURCHILL: It is most improbable that any of the existing licences will expire before the Transvaal has become a responsible self-governing colony. After the grant of self-government is complete, re-enlistment, like further importation, will be permitted only if the Transvaal Assembly pass a new Ordinance in respect of Chinese labour which commands the assent of the Imperial Government.

DR. MACNAMARA: Do I understand that re-enlistment will not be possible under the existing Ordinance after local self-government has been granted?

*MR. CHURCHILL: Re-enlistment under the existing Ordinance will, of course, not be possible. The whole matter will be reconsidered by the new Assembly and every circumstance will be subject to the general review of the Home Government.

Kaffir Outrages at Pietermaritzburg.

MR. HARMOOD-BANNER (Liverpool, Everton): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the number of outrages by Kaffirs on white women and children in Pietermaritzburg; and will he say what steps have been taken to put an end to this state of things.

*MR. CHURCHILL: The attention of the Secretary of State has not been called to this matter. It is for the Courts of the Colony to deal with such cases under the law of the land.

Flogging of Kaffir Servants by Boers.

MR. HARMOOD-BANNER: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies what steps he intends to take to compel the Boers to discontinue the use of the sambok in flogging their Kaffir servants; and if he will consider the possibility of making the sambok an illegal weapon.

*MR. CHURCHILL: The law at present imposes penalties on the employer for assault on his servant, and the Secretary of State is not aware that adequate cause has been shown for further legal provision.

Manchuria.

MR. COURTHOPE (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give the House any information with reference to the evacuation of Manchuria by the Russian army.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir EDWARD GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): According to the terms of the Treaty of Portsmouth of September 5th, 1905, the evacuation of Manchuria by the armies of Russia and Japan was to commence immediately after that date, and was to be completed within a period of eighteen months. The St. Petersburg Press reports that the evacuation by Russian troops is proceeding.

Illegal Flogging of Chinese Coolies.

DR. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the letter from the Chinese Legation, dated February 11th, 1904, pages 3 and 4, Cd. 1945, in which the Chinese Government insists that it shall not be legal to inflict corporal punishment upon Chinese coolies working under the Labour Ordinance in the Transvaal mines; whether his attention has been called to the assurance of the Colonial Office, dated February 15th, 1904, page 5, Cd. 1945, that this requirement shall be respected; whether it is now admitted that under Lord Milner's sanction this undertaking was violated; and, if so, what communication, if any, he proposes to make to the Chinese Government respecting the matter.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The Chinese asked that a special regulation should be made to prevent corporal punishment of the immigrant by the employer or his servant. This was considered to be sufficiently provided for by the fact that any labourers imported would be amenable to the law of the land, under which no corporal punishment could be inflicted except after trial and sentence by a magistrate or judge, and a special regulation was therefore held to be unnecessary. The extent to which this undertaking was infringed has now been publicly explained and admitted. The Chinese Government have made no communication on the subject; should they do so, His Majesty's Government will be prepared to give them a full statement of what has occurred and to repeat the assurance that nothing of the kind shall be repeated.

Congo Inquiry Report.

MR. J. R. MACDONALD (Leicester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can say if the Report of the second commission of inquiry into the conditions of the Congo is now ready; and, if so, whether he proposes to press that a copy of the full Report should be communicated to His Majesty's Government and laid upon the Table of this House.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The Report has not been published, but I understand that the recommendations which it contains are likely to be embodied immediately in enactments which we have reason to believe will be published next month.

National Repertory Theatre.

MR. W. F. D. SMITH (Strand, Westminster): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has been requested to grant an annual subsidy towards the permanent establishment of a national repertory theatre, in connection with a scheme suggested by Mr. Walter Stephens; and, if so, can he state the answer given to the request.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. ASQUITH, Fife, E.): My reply to the representations made to me by Mr. Stephens on this subject was that, regard being had to the large number of objects of much more pressing national importance for which funds are required, the Government would not, in my opinion, be justified in asking Parliament to subsidise such a scheme.

Lancashire County Court Clerks.

MR. SEDDON (Lancashire, Newton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will give a Return stating the number of junior clerks engaged in the county courts of Lancashire, salaries paid, length of service, and method of promotion; also whether salaries are progressive.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. MCKENNA, Monmouthshire, N.): Clerks in county courts, whether in Lancashire or elsewhere, are in the personal employment of the Registrars. The Treasury has no information from which a Return could be compiled giving the particulars asked for.

MR. BELLOC (Salford, S.): Is it intended to put these on the same footing as other civil servants?

MR. MCKENNA: They are not civil servants.

Passive Resisters.

LORD TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education if he will state the number of persons whose goods were distrained upon owing to objections to paying the Education Rate during the years 1903, 1904, and 1905.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): I am aware of the fact that prosecutions continue to be brought against persons holding conscientious objections to the Education Act of 1902, and I much regret it; but I do not see how the Government can interfere in the matter pending the introduction of the Education Bill.

Workmen's Compensation Acts.

MR. HENRY (Shropshire, Wellington): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it is the intention in the Bill to be submitted for amending the Workmen's Compensation Acts, to make provision that compensation should be extended to men and women who may contract injuries to health at their work through lead poisoning, gases, from anthrax, or other causes.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I hope to introduce the Workmen's Compensation Bill early next week. With my hon. friend's permission I will defer answering his Question till then.

Shop Hours Act.

MR. SEDDON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will give a Return giving the number of local orders issued under the Shop Hours Act of 1904, and what trades are included; and whether any orders have been made covering the whole of the trades in any particular town or area.

*MR. GLADSTONE: All Closing Orders under the Shop Hours Act are, when confirmed, laid before Parliament and are included in the lists issued as supplements to the Votes and Proceedings of the House of Commons. I think, therefore, that a Return is unnecessary, but I can give the hon. Member a list compiled in my own Department, if he desires. I may say that forty-nine orders have been confirmed in England and Wales, and that the great majority of these relate to the trade of barber or hairdresser. No order applying to all trades in a locality has yet been submitted for confirmation. As regards Scotland and Ireland, I must refer the hon. Member to the Departments responsible.

Aliens Act.

MR. FELL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the deaf and dumb alien, who was allowed to land because it was impossible to ascertain his country, or whether he was not a political refugee, is now in a workhouse; and, if so, what union is supporting him, and what steps he proposes to take in the matter.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I fear that I cannot identify the case to which the hon. Member refers. If it is the man whom I think, my information is that he is a Polish Jew, and the latest information was that he was wandering about the country.

Lunatic Asylum Attendants' Hours of Duty.

MR. PARKER (Halfax): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the number of working hours, ranging from fourteen to sixteen hours per day, worked by asylum attendants, and the percentage of these attendants who ultimately suffer from lunacy; and whether he is prepared to cause an inquiry to be made into the subject.

*MR. GLADSTONE: My attention has not been called to this matter, but I will cause inquiry to be made from the Lunacy Commissioners.

Accidents on the District Railway.

LORD CASTLEREAGH (Maidstone): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been directed to the public inconvenience caused by repeated breakdowns and stoppages on the District Railway; whether he can say what these occurrences arise from; and whether he will use his influence with the company to secure the provision of plant and rolling stock which will insure the proper running of the trains.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): Yes, Sir, I am aware that the public have suffered inconvenience from the circumstances to which the noble Lord draws attention, and I have communicated with the Railway Company, who have expressed their great regret for these delays, and the consequent disturbance of the train service. They state that it has been a task of very great difficulty to substitute electric for steam traction on the whole of the District Railway, and on other allied and connected lines; to increase the frequency and speed of the train services; to put into service an entire new equipment of rolling stock, and at the same time to introduce a complete system of automatic signalling, without interrupting the train service for a single day. It is added that the difficulties are being steadily overcome, and that the number of delays has now been greatly reduced. The company explain that the stoppages and delays have been mainly caused by a number of small (remediable) defects, in the mechanical and electrical equipments, and by the necessity of training, by experience, in new work a large number of men in various grades. They are making every effort to remedy the defects, and hope that the train services will soon be worked with no more than the normal percentage of failures, which must occur on every railway on which a train mileage of such density is run.

Freight Rates to South Africa.

Mr. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the freight rate from the United States of America to South Africa for agricultural machinery is 17s. 6d. a ton, whereas from this country it is 40s. per ton; that the average freight rates from the United States of America is 33⅓ less than the freight charged from this country; whether this has caused South African trade, especially in Cape Colony, to decline by 2½ per cent., whereas for the same period foreign trade with the same Colony has increased by 25 per cent.; whether this is due to the monopoly secured by the shipping ring, particularly the Union-Castle Company; and what action he proposes taking to remove this handicap from British trade with the South African Colonies.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have compared the figures quoted with the information on this subject in the possession of the Board of Trade, and I find that my hon. friend has been misinformed as to the figures he quotes, and the deductions which he draws from them are therefore probably erroneous. I have communicated with the Union-Castle and other lines interested. They say the tariff rates for agricultural machinery are as follows:—

From the United Kingdom.

25s.	25s.	32s. 6d.	32s. 6d.	35s.

25s.	27s. 6d.	30s.	32s. 6d.	40s.

On the whole therefore these rates are in favour of the United Kingdom. The whole question of South African freights is under the consideration of the Government.

Electricity Provisional Orders.

Dr. MACNAMARA: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will grant a Return showing the appeals to the Board of Trade in respect of Provisional Orders for electricity purposes by local authorities and companies during the ten years ended March, 1906, and also particulars of the names of local authorities and companies, objects of applications in appeals, dates when made, and decisions of the Board of Trade respecting them.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: I shall be pleased to communicate with my hon. friend with the object of meeting his wishes, if possible.

Railway Brakes and Couplings.

Mr. BELL (Derby): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will take an early opportunity of appointing a Statutory Committee, representing the railway companies, Board of Trade, and railway employees, to examine and select automatic couplings and either-side brakes for railway trucks, and arrange for experiments with such couplings and brakes, in accordance with Section 15, Sub-sections 1, 2, and 3 of The Railway Employment (Prevention of Accidents) Act, 1900, with a view to their adoption.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Yes, Sir, steps will be taken to set up such a Committee at an early date, and I hope it may be possible to constitute it somewhat in the manner suggested.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider the possibility of enabling the Committee to test practically designs submitted by railway employees, who necessarily have the best knowledge of what is required, but who in most cases have not the necessary means to enable them to give a practical full-scale demonstration of their inventions?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Of course; that is the object of the Committee.

*MR. ARTHUR LEE: Have you the sanction of the Treasury to spend any money on this?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Yes. I have the sanction of the Treasury to expend a certain sum of money upon practical experiments.

Isle of Dogs.

MR. BROOKE (Tower Hamlets, Bow and Bromley): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Millwall Dock Company has for a number of years been in the habit of depositing dredged material on land in the Isle of Dogs closely adjacent to inhabited houses; whether, in view of the continual protest made by residents of these houses and the inhabitants of the Isle of Dogs generally against such deposits, as a menace to health, as a source of offensive odours, and a danger to the adjoining property, he will urge upon the Millwall Dock Company their obligation to cease and discontinue these deposits of the dredgings of their docks on the said land; and whether he will consider the desirability of using the opportunity afforded by the Millwall Dock (Superfluous Lands) and London and India Docks, and Millwall Dock Companies (Amalgamation) Bills for making provision to secure this object.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): My attention has been called to this matter. I understand that the Company in 1898 expressed their willingness to discontinue the practice of depositing dredged material on the land referred to if detriment to the public health could be shown, but that up to the present time no sufficient evidence in support of the contention that the deposit is a menace to health has been obtained. I have no control over the Company, and I do not think that I could take action with a view of giving effect to the suggestion in the last paragraph of the Question.

Australian Mail Service.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State to the Colonies if he will state what are the arrangements of the Government as to the Australian mail service, and when the present mail contract ceases; and whether the Commonwealth Government have made any arrangements with the Home Government on the subject of the carriage of mails for the future.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): Perhaps I may be allowed to answer this Question. The arrangements are as follows:—Under a contract with the Peninsula and Oriental Company for a mail service to and from India, China and Australia; a fortnightly service is provided by His Majesty's Government to and from Australia; and under a contract with the Oriental Company an alternating fortnightly service in both directions is provided by the Australian Government. Both contracts expire on January 31st, 1908. The Commonwealth Government have made no arrangements with the Home Government on the subject of the carriage of mails after that date.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Am I to understand that the contract with the Peninsula and Oriental Company is entirely paid for by the British Government and that with the Oriental Company by the Commonwealth Government?

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: That is substantially the case.

Postal Inquiry.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD (Liverpool, West Derby): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he will give a schedule of the various classes of employees in his Department whose case can be argued before the Select Committee.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: It is for the Committee to decide what classes of Post Office servants are covered by the reference.

Mr. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD: Is it not competent for the Postmaster-General to state what classes he proposes to include in the inquiry?

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: It is for the Committee to interpret the terms of reference.

Lord Stanley's Revision.

Mr. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if he can state whether the scheme for reorganisation of officers, promised by Lord Stanley, is yet completed, and when it is likely to be made public.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: Before framing the scheme of reclassification to which the hon. Members refers, it was necessary to ascertain the comparative cost of living in various localities. This involved prolonged and detailed inquiry, which is not yet completed.

Mr. Donald Murray.

Mr. WARDLE (Stockport): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if the Electrical Engineer (unestablished) referred to in the Revenue Department Estimates, page 114, is Mr. Donald Murray, the inventor of the Murray telegraph system; and if so, does Mr. Murray receive a salary of £500 from the Government; and further, what steps have been taken to ensure that the experience thus gained shall not be used to the advantage of foreign Governments.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: The reply to the first two Questions is in the affirmative. No steps have been taken in the direction indicated. Telegraph administrations all over the world freely place their experience at the disposal of each other; their interest in efficient telegraphy is one and the same.

Sheep Scab in East Yorkshire.

Mr. STANLEY WILSON (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he is aware that there is no sheep scab in the East Riding of Yorkshire; and whether he will, therefore, consider the advisability of excluding it from a compulsory sheep-dipping order.

Sir EDWARD STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.): My noble friend received a deputation from the East Riding County Council on this subject last week, and the representations they made are now under consideration.

Rotherham Pupil Teacher's Dismissal.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he has asked the Rotherham Borough Council, or the Committee, for an explanation of their action in connection with the dismissal of Miss Turner, a pupil teacher, for refusing to remove an engagement ring from her finger, at the bidding of Miss Hodge, one of the mistresses; what explanation do they offer for their treatment of this young lady; whether he is aware that, when ordered to remove the ring, Miss Turner stated that she was wearing it with the sanction of her parents, and that she did not recognise the authority of any one else to order her to remove it; whether there is any rule prohibiting the wearing of engagement rings in the pupil teacher centre, Rotherham; and whether he will recommend that Miss Turner be reinstated in her position, where she gave five years service, or that adequate compensation be given her for the loss of her employment.

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of EDUCATION (Mr. Birrell, Bristol, N.): I have communicated with the Rotherham Borough Council, and I am informed that technically Miss Turner was not dismissed, but that the borough council took advantage of the clause in her agreement under which the agreement might be terminated by either party at any time, without assigning cause, on the payment of £5. Her wages were also paid up to date. No interference is possible on the part of the Board.

Members' Hair Dressing Room.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he is aware that the Members of the House consider that the charges in the hair-dressing department are too high; and whether he can do anything to reduce them.

The FIRST COMMISSIONER of WORKS (Mr. Harcourt, Lancashire, Rossendale): Yes; my attention has been called to this matter and, as I find that that piece of patronage is in my gift, I have been able to secure an immediate reduction of all the charges by one-half.

Dunblane Police Court.

Mr. ERSKINE (Perthshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether his attention has been directed to the fact that the burgh of Dunblane has, in respect of their powers under Act of Parliament, set up a police court in the said burgh; whether he is aware that the county council of Perthshire has been applied to for, and has refused to supply, the necessary police assistance (such as it affords to other burgh police courts in the county) to enable the business of the said court to be carried on, with the result that it is impossible to adequately prosecute the police offences that are committed within the said burgh; and whether he will take such steps, by legislation or otherwise, as may be necessary to bring this state of matters to an end.

The SECRETARY for SCOTLAND (Mr. Sinclair, Forfarshire): I understand that the burgh of Dunblane has set up a police court and has applied for the assistance of the police in connection with it to the county council, but these two authorities have not come to terms on the question. I am advised by the present Lord Advocate, who concurs with an opinion of Lord Advocate Graham Murray, expressed on the same subject, that neither the Lord Advocate nor the Secretary for Scotland has any authority to intervene, and I do not therefore propose to take any further steps in the matter.

Oysterbed Quay, Sneem.

Mr. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a storehouse is very much required on Oysterbed Quay, at Sneem, county Kerry; and whether in view of the fact that all opposition on the part of the landlord to its erection has been withdrawn, and that, owing to the absence of a storehouse, this quay is very little used, the Congested Districts Board will undertake to erect one.

The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Bryce, Aberdeen, S.): The Congested Districts Board are aware that a storehouse on Sneem Pier is needed, but as only one steamer trades to Sneem, the Board are of opinion that the owners should provide their own store. The Board, moreover, have been advised that they have no power to give a site for a building on the pier which they have constructed, even if the space were sufficient, which it is not; and they are not the owners of the adjacent land.

Warden Estate, Sneem.

Mr. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the cause of the delay on the part of the Estates Commissioners in sanctioning the sale of the Warden estate, at Sneem, county Kerry; whether it is intended that the townlands of Druminamore, Druminabeg, and the village of Sneem, will be included in the sale; and whether, in carrying out improvements on the estate, the Commissioners will make a new road at Dereenavarrig, to which the attention of the Congested Districts Board has been frequently called in past years.

Mr. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners are negotiating with the owners for the purchase of the estate mentioned, but the completion of the purchase is awaiting the decision of the Judicial Commissioners upon a point of law which has been raised. The proposed purchase does not include the townlands of Druminamore, Druminabeg, or the village of Sneem. If the Commissioners should purchase the property, they will consider the question of making the new road referred to.

Commitments for Contempt of Court.

Mr. DILLON (Mayo, E.): On behalf of the hon. Member for North Sligo I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to proceedings in the Land Judge's Court in Dublin, on March 9th, when attachments had been issued against Thomas J. Smith, J.P., Joseph Mulligan, and Terence Fitzpatrick; whether he is aware that the three defendants named were charged with a criminal offence, and pleaded not guilty, and demanded, through their counsel, a trial in accordance with constitutional usage; and whether, seeing that there is no appeal from the order made sentencing the defendants to unlimited terms of imprisonment, and that under that order they may be kept in prison for life unless they plead guilty of a charge which they deny having committed, he proposes to introduce legislation to deal with the matter.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to refer to my replies to previous Questions on this subject on Thursday last†. I understand that these persons were charged with contempt of court in taking part in an unlawful assembly, the object of which was alleged to be to intimidate the holder of a farm which is under the control of the Court. I am informed that there is no constitutional usage which requires trial by jury to be had in such cases. I understand that the law in these matters is the same in England as in Ireland. There is no intention of introducing separate legislation for Ireland.

MR. DILLON: Then are the Irish Government prepared to acquiesce in a system which allows a Judge on the affidavit of an interested person to imprison a man for life?

MR. BRYCE: I cannot make any statement as to altering the law until I have considered the point. It is the same in both countries.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): It is not administered in the same way.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): Will the right hon. Gentleman refer to the declaration of Mr. Gladstone that legislation ought to be introduced on this question.

MR. BRYCE: Yes, if you give me the date.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: October, 1882, in this House.

MR. T. L. CORBETT (Down, N.): Does the Lord Chancellor propose to remove Mr. Smith's name from the Commission of the Peace?

Seed Potato Supply Loans.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is prepared to recommend that a lower rate of interest than the 3½ per cent. mentioned shall be payable to the Board of Works under the Seed Potatoes Supply (Ireland) Bill.

MR. BRYCE: The rate of interest, namely 3½ per cent., provided for in the Seed Potatoes Supply (Ireland) Bill, was fixed when the loans were advanced as being the lowest rate at which the loans could be made without loss. I may, however, remind the hon. Member that the Department of Agriculture has made a grant in aid of these seed supply operations which will cover the interest on all the loans nearly twice over.

Section 7 of the Irish Land Act.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the latest Return disclosing the fact that 2,221 tenants and thirty-eight sub-tenants have been deprived of their tenancies during the year 1905 under Section 7 of the Land Act; and whether, in view of the fact that these persons have lost all right under the various Land Acts passed with a view to settle the Irish land question, the Government will bring in a short Bill during the present session repealing the said section.

MR. BRYCE: The numbers of tenants and sub-tenants upon whom eviction notices under Section 7 of the Land Law Act 1887 were served in the year 1905, are correctly stated in the Question. The great majority of such persons are not ultimately deprived of their tenancies, and do not lose their rights under the various Land Acts. The section quoted provides a right of redemption which may be exercised within a period of six months; and upon the exercise of such power of redemption all rights are restored to the tenant. The numbers of tenants and sub-tenants actually dispossessed from their holdings under the section quoted during the year 1905, were ninety-six and five, respectively, that is, less than 5 per cent. of the number served with eviction notices. I am advised that a repeal of the section might prove to be an injury rather than a benefit to the tenants concerned, seeing that it might involve the actual eviction of tenants who, from any temporary cause, were unable to pay their rents.

MR. FLYNN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that many of those who were prominently connected with the enactment of Section 7 have since expressed their strong condemnation of it—for instance, the hon. Member for South Tyrone?

MR. BRYCE: I am not aware of that, but I may say my right hon. friend the Attorney-General for Ireland thinks it very doubtful whether an amendment of the law would really benefit the tenants.

Dr. Ellis's Surcharges.

MR. MOONEY (Newry): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the action of Dr. Ellis, the Local Government Board auditor, who has recently surcharged six urban councillors in Newry £1,092, on the grounds that the defaulting rate collector's bond was not in order, and of no use, and that money was lost; and whether, in view of the fact that under the Public Bodies Orders, the auditor is responsible for the correctness and utility of the bonds of the officers, and is provided with a special form (Form 41 G) for that purpose, to be filled up and signed by the auditor, he will state whether he will take steps to set aside this surcharge.

MR. BRYCE: The Local Government Board have not yet received the auditor's report on the audit of the accounts referred to. Pending receipt of this report, the Board are not in a position to express an opinion on the case, but it may be pointed out that the Public Bodies Order did not come into force until April 1st, 1905, whereas the surcharge in question was made in respect of the accounts for the previous year.

AN HON. MEMBER: Is this not the gentleman who has been removed from various districts because he is in the habit of making vexatious and illegal surcharges?

Mr. J. M'Inerney of Ennistymon.

MR. HALPIN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the police protection afforded to Mr. John M'Inerney, of Ennistymon; and whether, seeing that Mr. John M'Inerney goes to fairs and markets through West Clare, leaving home early in the morning and coming home late at night, without police protection, and that he travels to his farm fifteen miles from his residence without protection, he will explain why the only place and time that he has police with him is in the streets of Ennistymon from 10 a.m. until 2.30 a.m. the following morning.

MR. BRYCE: I am informed that Mr. M'Inerney is not in receipt of constant police protection, but that such protection as may be necessary is afforded to him by police patrols. This form of protection is given both by day and night, in Ennistymon and elsewhere, as necessity arises.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Is it not the fact that at the last assizes the Judge congratulated the people of the county on its peaceable state?

MR. BRYCE: I believe so.

Commission of National Education for Ireland.

MR. BOLAND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what was the amount voted to defray the expenses of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland for the year ending 31st March, 1906; has the full amount of this Vote been expended; and, if not, can he state what unexpended balance is it estimated will remain at the end of the year.

MR. BRYCE: The net amount voted to defray the expenses of the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland for the year ending 31st March, 1906, was £1,391,721, exclusive of grants from the Ireland Development Fund. The Commissioners do not anticipate any considerable unexpended balance, but no statement on the subject can be made until after the 31st March.

Rates on Iron Hay Sheds.

MR. HALPIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the revisors of rateable property in the county of Clare have been instructed to value iron hay-sheds put up by the tenant farmers so as to levy rates off them; and, if so, whether he will issue instructions to the revisors of the county of Clare to discontinue valuing these sheds, in view of the taxation already levied on these tenants.

MR. McKENNA: Under Section 12 of the Valuation (Ireland) Act of 1852 farm out-houses are rateable hereditaments and must therefore be valued for local rating. The valuation is done on the request of the county or urban district councils. Under Section 14 of the same Act, however, these out-houses escape local rates for a period of seven years after they are erected.

Registration of Teachers in Ireland.

MR. BOLAND: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he is aware that information respecting the fact of their recognition under certain provisions of the Order in Council establishing a register of teachers, is forwarded to the Irish Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction, instead of being sent directly to the schools which have applied for such recognition; and can he state the reason for this course of action.

MR. BIRRELL: The practice of the Board is as described. The Board communicate with the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction as to the recognition of the schools, and it seems, therefore, the proper course to announce the results through them.

MR. BOLAND: Is this a new development.

MR. BIRRELL: I will inquire.

Annaclone Postal District.

MR. LIDDELL (Down, W): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General what are the present arrangements for the delivery and despatch of letters in the Annaclone postal district, county Down; and whether, seeing that the district affected by the present system is nearer to Banbridge than Rathfriland, that it is dependent largely on its trade and business relations with the former town, and that a great many letters are addressed with Banbridge instead of Rathfriland for this district, he can say what additional expenditure, if any, would be involved if Banbridge, which is only five miles from Annaclone, was made the head office instead of Newry, which is fourteen miles distant as the letters are now carried.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: Inquiry is being made on this subject and I will communicate the result to the hon. Member in due course.

Keadue Telegraph Office.

MR. JAMES O'KELLY (Roscommon, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether the Post Office authorities are about to establish a new telegraph office in a public-house in Keadue, county Roscommon; and whether, in view of the Post Office regulations against having an office upon premises licensed for the sale of intoxicants, he can state the reasons for a departure from the regulations in this case; and whether other and more suitable premises cannot be obtained in the village

MR SYDNEY BUXTON: The Post Office at Keadue, to which the telegraph system is about to be extended, is in the licensed premises in which the Post Office business has been conducted for the last twenty-six years. I am not aware of the reasons for which an exception to the usual rule was sanctioned when this office was opened; but as the sub-postmistress is prepared to provide a suitable office with a separate entrance, I do not, under the circumstances, propose to remove the office to other premises.

Lord Dudley and Devolution.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: I wish to ask you, Sir, a Question on a matter of order. I wish to ask you whether I would be in order in addressing the following Question to the Leader of the Opposition:—"Whether he would consent now to the publication of the correspondence which took place between him as Prime Minister and Lord Dudley as Viceroy of Ireland, on the question of devolution?"

*MR. SPEAKER: The Question addressed to the Leader of the Opposition by the hon. Member does not relate to any matter or any Bill before this House. I should like to have seen the Question in writing so that I might have given it full consideration, but, having heard it, I should say that it is not a Question that could be asked.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will take cognisance of the Question which, if it had been in order, I would have addressed to him.

The Durst Hop Pool.

MR. COURTHOPE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he is aware that M. H. Durst, of Wheatland, California, exporter of hops for the London market, has formed a corporation, known as the Durst Hop Pool, to control the hop crop of Oregon; and that the Oregon hop-growers employ Chinese labour; and whether he will take steps to prevent this or similar hop pools from destroying the English hop industry, which employs more labour per acre than any other branch of agriculture.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN Stirling Burghs): No, Sir, the Government have no information as to the formation of the Durst Hop Pool. As to Chinese labour I am informed that it is not employed to any extent by the Oregon hop growers, and I have no reason to believe that so far as it may be employed it is otherwise than under free conditions. With regard to the last part of the Question, I am afraid I cannot undertake to embark on a crusade against hop pools in the United States or anywhere else.

Ministers and Company Directorships.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, the President of the Board of Education, the Paymaster-General, the Secretary of State for India, the Under-Secretary of State for India, the Under-Secretary of State for War, the Secretary to the Admiralty, the hon. Member for Saffron Walden, a Lord of the Treasury, the Civil Lord of the Admiralty, and Lords Granville and Denman, Lords in Waiting, have been recently directors of public companies, holding directorships of the Canada Life Insurance Company, of the Great North of Scotland Railway, of the North British and Mercantile Insurance Company, of the Royal Bank of Scotland, of the Western Assurance Company, of the London and Provincial Bank, of the National Provident Institution, of the Anglo-Californian Bank, of the Great Northern, Piccadilly, and Brompton Railway Company, of the Star Life Assurance Society, of Sir Joseph Causton and Sons, Limited, of the Scarborough Electric Supply Company, of the Artisans', Labourers', and General Dwellings Company, of Western Mansions, Limited, of Pease and Partners, Limited, of the British Columbia Land and Investment Agency, Limited, of the Wouldham Cement Company, of the Lilleshall Company, Limited, and of the International Tea Company's Stores, Limited; and whether in view of their duties as Ministers of the Crown, he will say whether these Ministers of the Crown have resigned from the above-named companies; and, if so, will he give the date of such resignations.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The condition which was laid down on the formation of the Government was that all directorships held by Ministers must be resigned except in the case of honorary directorships, directorships in connection with philanthropic undertakings, and directorships in private companies. Every member of the Government has either complied with this understanding or is in process of complying with it. I do not think it is necessary to say more except to add that my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for India, whose name is mentioned in the Question, has never held a directorship, and the same remark applies to my hon. friend the Civil Lord of the Admiralty.

MR. CLAUDE HAY said the name of the Civil Lord or the Admiralty appeared in error. It should have been Secretary of the Board of Trade. He asked whether the process of resignation was still in course of being carried out, and, if so, when it would be completed.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not know that the process of resigning is complete. Sometimes it is necessary or desirable or convenient to go on until the annual meeting is held, or some occasion of that sort. It is not desirable that these things should be done in an inconvenient way. The purpose will be carried out to the full.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY: Will the right hon. Gentleman give a list of the directorships in private companies held by members of the Government.

Mr. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the International Tea Company is a philanthropic society?

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I should say that depends on the quality of its tea.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: May I ask the Prime Minister whether he intends to introduce legislation to give effect to the excellent rule he has laid down, having regard to the fact that among the the members of the late Government no fewer seventy-one company directorships were held.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I hope that legislation will not be necessary. A good example has been set.

Discussion of Indian Subjects by Parliament.

Mr. SMEATON (Stirlingshire): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will consider the advisability of placing the salary of the Secretary of State for India on the Estimates, so as to enable this House to challenge by a direct vote any action of the Government of India, or of the Secretary of State, of which it disapproves.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The issue raised is a large and important one involving grave constitutional and legal considerations; and we cannot at present give any pledge or promise on the subject.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. AKERS-DOUGLAS (Kent, St Augustine's): I wish to ask what business will be taken to-morrow.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said that the business to-morrow would be the Second Reading of the Consolidated Fund Bill, and on Thursday he hoped to make the ordinary Motion for the Speaker to leave the Chair on the Civil Service Estimates.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

House of Commons (Procedure). That they give leave to the Viscount Selby to attend in order to his being examined as a Witness before the Select Committee appointed by this House on House of Commons (Procedure), his Lordship consenting.

Sunday Trading. That they have appointed a Committee, consisting of Five Lords, to join with a Committee of this House to inquire into the subject of Sunday Trading, and request this House to appoint an equal number of its Members to be joined with the said Lords.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (SUPPLY).

Ordered, That the Proceedings on the Business of Supply, if under discussion on the interruption of Business at this Afternoon's Sitting, be resumed and proceeded with, though opposed, after the interruption of Business at this Evening's Sitting.—(Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.)

THE MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): I have to ask the leave of the House to introduce a Bill to amend the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894 to 1900. The Bill which I propose to introduce is based on the report of two or three Committees. The first is the Committee which reported in 1903, Lord St. Helier's Committee, dealing with two or three different matters relating to the mercantile marine; secondly, the Seaman's Wages Committee, which reported last year; and, thirdly, the Committee known as Mr. Bonar Law's Foreign Ships Statutory Requirements Committee, which also reported last year. No attempt is to be made to codify the Merchant Shipping Act, although that is very necessary. An amendment was felt very necessary to bring the merchant shipping laws up to date last year, but owing to the fact that no time was given by the Government the Bill had to be carried through without any amendment at all. This Bill deals with a few of the admitted grievances from which British shipowners and seamen suffer. The first is in reference to the application of our safety regulations to foreign ships. The regulations applicable to British ships may be divided roughly into four parts. One deals with overloading; the second deals with unseaworthiness—the defective condition of hull, machinery, and equipment, and undermanning; the third deals with stowage of grain; and the fourth deals with appliances—life-boats, buoys, and life-belts. There is no doubt at all that these regulations have had the effect of saving life during the years they have been in operation. In 1872 I find that the loss of life in the mercantile marine amounted to 3,533, in 1874 to 4,171, and in 1904, the last year for which we have returns, to 1,113—a very considerable reduction. The loss of life in 1872 was one in sixty-four of those employed in our merchant ships, and it now varies between 1 in 150 and 1 in 220. This is not entirely attributable to legislation with regard to life-saving appliances and with regard to overloading and unseaworthiness. It is due also very largely to the gradual substitution of steam for sailing ships. With regard to the overloading of foreign ships in British ports, under the regulations they may be detained at the present moment if they are overloaded. These are made applicable by the rules of the Board of Trade—in 1876 a clause was introduced into the Act which made it distinctly applicable to foreign ships loading cargo in a British port; but unfortunately owing to the absence of the disc, it was exceedingly difficult to detect what ships were overloaded and what were not, and, if the Board of Trade officials detained a vessel which afterwards on survey was discovered as a matter of fact to be not overloaded, then the Government would be liable to very substantial damages for detention. Unless it was pretty obvious that a foreign ship was overloaded, the Board of Trade officials were naturally very cautious and circumspect and did not care to run the risk of detaining a vessel. Foreign ships could arrive in this country overloaded, and we have had a good many cases. We watched for some months, and reports were made to the Board of Trade. There is a very long list appended to the report on the subject, as an appendix to the evidence of Mr. Howell, of foreign ships overloaded, some to the extent of ten, twelve, and even nineteen inches, arriving in British ports in very dangerous conditions, especially ships engaged in the carrying of ore from Spain and Sweden. The Board of Trade had no right to interfere, because the regulations were not applicable to ships arriving from foreign ports. The same thing applies to unseaworthiness. A foreign ship might arrive in a British port and sail from a British port in a most unseaworthy condition: her hull might be defective and her machinery and equipment might be deficient, but the Board of Trade had no right to intervene at all.

An HON. MEMBER: Both going and coming?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Yes, both going and coming. There is no distinction. If British shipowners found when their ships were condemned as unseaworthy by the Board of Trade officials that it was hardly worth refitting them, if they were too rotten, they generally sold them to foreigners. There was no market for them in this country, and the consequence was that they were sold practically for an old song. I find that last year 78 per cent. of 422,000 tons of British steamers sold to foreign shipowning syndicates, was constructed before 1895, whereas in our own country we added 1,226,000 steam tons to the register of the United Kingdom, 98 per cent. of it being new steamers. Not merely is the initial expenditure less, consequently upon the foreign shipowner getting old, discarded British ships for next to nothing, but the current expenditure of keeping the ship going is less. We have no regulations compelling them to keep up the standard, which will cost a considerable sum of money. Consequently the competition to which British shipowners were subjected by these vessels was grossly unfair. The initial capital was less, the expenditure of keeping them going was less, and not merely that, but they might come to this country considerably overloaded, probably over 200 or 300 tons in some cases. We, on the other hand, compelled our ships to be up-to-date, to conform to our regulations with regard to life-saving appliances; and shipowners not unnaturally complained that the competition was exceedingly unfair. Seeing that these laws were passed in the interests of humanity, in the interests of saving life—and that, after all, is not a national, but an international obligation—we felt that it was grossly unfair to impose obligations of this character upon our shipowners in the interests of humanity, and at the same time to allow foreigners to come into our ports and break our own laws. Therefore it is the intention of the Government to make these rules and regulations applicable to foreign ships, whether they sail from British ports or whether they arrive in British ports. In order to make them effective, it is perfectly clear you cannot throw the risk upon the Board of Trade surveyor of saying whether the ship is overloaded or not. It is too much of a risk for him to undertake at the present moment, and the result is that a very considerable number escape. Therefore it is intended that after a certain date—two or three years will be given to enable the foreign shipowners who trade regularly with this country to make up their minds—foreign shipowners must subscribe to the conditions of the same disc to enable any one to see whether the ship is overloaded or not. After that date the foreign ship cannot be overloaded whether coming or going, she must be in a perfectly seaworthy condition, and coming and going she must be subject to the same regulations with regard to life-saving appliances. The only other point is with respect to stowage of grain. In some trades it is exceedingly dangerous unless you stow grain very carefully, for in rough weather the grain may be shifted and give the ship a list, rendering her very dangerous, and there are cases where the vessel has turned turtle as the result of the shifting of grain in rough weather. We have introduced regulations for the very careful stowage of grain in some parts of the ocean, more especially in the North Atlantic, Mediterranean, and the Black Sea, to prevent accidents of that character, but they are not applicable to foreign ships. Thirty-six foreign ships of this character were watched the year before last, and this is the result. In nineteen cases the precautions which had been taken against the shifting of grain were practically equivalent to ours. It is not our idea to impose our regulations on foreign ships if their own are in the main equivalent to ours. In nineteen cases they were practically equivalent to ours, in five they were described as fair, and in twelve as more or less indifferent. In those cases the ships would be subjected to the same regulations with regard to the stowage of grain as our ships. The same thing applies to life-saving appliances. I do not think that the foreigner can complain. After all, he is treated very well in this country—very much to our advantage. We buy nothing from him that we do not want. There is no compulsory purchase of foreign goods. We have given him an open market and open harbours, and we treat him exactly as we treat our own ships. The Government do not propose to impose upon him any obligations which our own ships have not been subjected to for years, very much to their own benefit. It is to be made plain that their ships shall enjoy the same rights, privileges, liberties, immunities and exceptions in matters of navigation as are or may be enjoyed by ours. That is really what you find in all navigation agreements; they simply claim the same privileges and rights as native subjects enjoy.

MR. H. H. MARKS (Kent, Thanet): What will you get in return?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: That is all we propose to do. We propose to put them under exactly the same obligations, and, after all, we have a sort of national obligation. Up to the present we have exacted a standard in the matter of protecting life at sea. It is not a fancy standard. It is something we have subjected our own ships to for years. Other countries are gradually approximating to ours. Germany is getting closer year by year and France is improving. It is not the great countries we complain so much about. Therefore I think it would assist if we not merely set this standard for our own ships, but insisted upon its being applicable to every ship that trades with our ports. After all, our carrying trade is the greatest in the world. There is a real inducement for foreign shipowners to follow the very excellent example set by us in this respect. So much for that part of the matter. I think I have dealt with grain stowage, life-saving apparatus, seaworthiness, and load line. There is one thing before I dispose of this part of the Bill I should like to say. It is obviously impossible to apply rigidly our rule to foreign countries who have got regulations of their own that are practically equivalent to ours, and therefore we take power where we are satisfied that the regulations of any particular country are substantially equal to ours to except by Order in Council all vessels of that country from our rules with regard to loading. At present, if a foreign emigrant ship calls at a British port to take emigrants on board, she is subject to all the emigration regulations of this country, but if she is an emigrant ship calling for passengers she is not liable or subject to our passenger regulations. Now I think the House will agree that if they are already made liable to our emigration regulations, they should also be subject to our passenger regulations with regard to overcrowding, and more particularly with regard to life-saving appliances if they are going to take passengers. There again these regulations are in the interests of humanity.

I now come to deal with a subject of much greater complexity and difficulty and one which has caused me much more anxiety. It is the question of foreign seamen. I confess when I first looked into the figures I was really very startled. In 1870 we had 200,000 British seamen in British ships, and 18,000 foreign seamen and hardly any lascars; I will give the lascars separately because their case is very different from that of foreign seamen. In 1904 the number of British sailors had fallen from 200,000 to 176,000, and the number of foreign sailors had increased from 18,000 to 39,000. The foreigner had increased from 9 per cent. to 22 per cent. Whereas we had hardly any lascars in 1870—I believe they began about 1886—you had lascars before that but not in great numbers—they have now increased to 42,000 odd. I confess, looking at these figures, they are rather startling, and in the evidence taken on the subject suggestions have been put forward, sometimes by representatives of the seamen, and sometimes by others, that the presence of many foreigners in our British mercantile marine is attributable to the fact that the shipowner can get foreign seamen at a lower rate of pay and that he is much more amenable to discipline. But I confess, after going into it very carefully—not merely reading evidence, but seeing shipowners and making inquiries—that I do not think there is substantial ground for that suggestion. I think shipowners have no alternative. They have taken foreign sailors because there is not an adequate supply of British sailors for the purpose of meeting the enormous and growing demands of our mercantile marine. The growth of the mercantile marine has been so amazing. It was quite impossible for the supply to keep pace with it. In 1870 you had 5,500,000 tons and in 1904 that had gone up to 10,250,000 tons, almost double in thirty-five years. The number of men employed in 1870 was 218,000 and in 1904 259,000. The Navy has practically taken the cream of our men engaged in seafaring life. In 1868 there were 64,000 men in our Navy, and last year we took a Vote for 129,000 men, double the number. Last year one out of every thirty-six of the adult population of this country was engaged in a seafaring occupation, and supposing you brought in a Bill to stop every foreign seaman being engaged on British ships you would ruin the British mercantile marine. I do not despair of being able to do something with the assistance of shipowners, who seem to me just as anxious as anybody to get British seamen into British ships, and we are considering all sorts of schemes at the present time. Sir Alfred Jones has been down to Swansea, and he has suggested that in each port you should set up some arrangement for the purpose of training British sailors. I think that is an admirable idea, and I think if the Corporation in every seaport town in the United Kingdom were to take the matter up, in a short time shipowners would not be driven as they are now to foreign seamen for the purpose of manning their great fleets. That, however, is a thing we could not possibly introduce into an Act of Parliament at the present stage.

That is with regard to that particular branch. Let me put another point before I dismiss it. I have not disposed altogether of foreign seamen. A good deal of British shipping trading between foreign ports never touch the home ports. The ships have hardly been at home since construction. We have 54 per cent. of the carrying trade of the world. There has not been anything like it in history. It is not merely that we carry two-thirds of our own trade, but 54 per cent. of the trade of the whole world, and therefore, a good number of British ships trade between foreign ports and never touch home ports except once every four years for the purpose of classification at Lloyds. You cannot get British sailors to remain on board ships of that kind. You may get your captain and officers, but you cannot get your British sailor to live altogether in a foreign port. If you prevent shipowners from engaging foreign sailors you stop the whole of that international trade, and that is why I have come to the conclusion that British shipowners are not altogether to blame for the enormous increases of foreign sailors in British ships. They have no alternative. I believe from what I have seen that they are anxious and will assist in the future to get British sailors into British ships. It is said that there is really a great danger to the safety of the country, but that is not the view of the Admiralty. I am not a great authority on armaments, but it really seems to be the view of men who know about it that there is no real substantial danger. They say that when war comes you would not draw so very much from the mercantile marine, because you would want them to carry on the trade. I would remind hon. Members who think otherwise that, as I am told, in Nelson's fleet 22 per cent. of the men were foreigners. That is not the state of things now. So much for the pure foreigner. Now I come to the lascars. There has been a decrease during the last two or three years, so far as the foreigner is concerned, and I am inclined to believe that that decrease is a permanent thing, because the conditions are improving in foreign ships, and the greater the improvement the more foreign countries will be able to absorb their own seafaring population. But when you come to the lascar there is a continual increase. The lascar, however, is a Britisher. [A LABOUR MEMBER: Like the Chinaman!] You cannot make a Britisher of him merely for the sake of bragging of the extent of your dominions, and then the moment he asks for a share of your privileges say "You are a foreigner." That is not fair; it is a question of fair play. [A LABOUR MEMBER: And wages!] The lascars themselves sent a petition which is rather interesting. They are very much concerned about their accommodation. They said—

> "We are told that in the Parliament of England sits a gentleman of the name of Havelock Wilson Sahib. He has urged there lately, as he has often done in the past, that we should be given more space. We beseech your Lordships to tell him that his benevolence will be our bane; that as we have done him no wrong, and if he really wishes us well he will have the mercy to spare us. Should he, however, pursue us with his attentions, we are sure that after this humble representation of ours, the other members of the great Assembly will refuse to listen to him."

The lascars came before Lord St Helier's Committee and I am assured by those who sat on that Committee—and they are very competent judges—that no more intelligent witnesses came before them than these fellow-British subjects of ours. I am told, on all hands, that the lascars are very intelligent, exceedingly sober, hard-working and skilful, and in an emergency they are courageous men. Let me put in another word for the lascar. The lascar is an hereditary sailor. He belongs to a sailor caste. He is bound by the rules of his caste to pursue the trade his ancestors have pursued from time immemorial, from the days of the Flood. Well, now, what do they say? They had a considerable coasting trade along the coast of India. We came along and deprived them of their livelihood and they say that the least we can do is to allow them to take part in running our great mercantile marine. I am with them heartily. The British mercantile marine cannot do without them.

There is a real objection in the case of the foreign seaman because he very often endangers the safety of the ship through not being able to understand the words of command. There have been a good many cases of that character lately. If the House will allow me I will refer to one or two of them. There were cases which were tried at Cardiff. There were quite a number of wrecks, and an inquiry was held at Cardiff by a very competent and experienced Judge, and in at least three of the cases it was shown that a majority of the seamen on board were foreigners. This is the judgment of the Court in one case—the case of the "Ordovician."

"It is not within the province of this court to express an opinion as to policy, expedience, or necessity of employing foreign seamen on British ships, nor to institute any comparison between British and foreign seamen. But the Court deems it a duty to direct attention to the fact that this is the third wreck inquiry held here within a month, in which the deck hands have been chiefly foreign seamen with no knowledge of the English language.

"In the recent 'Rowtor' inquiry it was proved that a Spaniard who could neither speak nor understand English was at the wheel when the vessel stranded, and the court found that either bad steering or a certain other cause mentioned was a contributory cause of the stranding.

"In the inquiry into the loss of the "Bavaria"—which involved the loss of many lives—the only deck hands that gave evidence were Russians who were entirely ignorant of the English language; and this court was satisfied that they made a false imputation on the reputation of the master, who had lost his life in trying to save his vessel."

In the case of the "Bavaria," it was shown that foreign seamen managed to get hold of the life-boat, and having got on board with only one Britisher a Russian cut the rope; those in the life-boat were saved, but all the rest of the hands sank. In another case—the "Ordovician"—a Greek who could speak no English was at the wheel, and a Greek who could speak no English was at the look-out; also bad steering conduced to the casualty. There is overwhelming evidence that the lives of men engaged at sea are endangered by the fact that you have seamen on board who do not understand the English language, who consequently do not understand the word of command, and who, especially in moments of emergency, are absolutely worthless for that reason. The Government are of opinion that, although they cannot bring in a Bill to exclude foreign seamen from British ships, at any rate they ought to introduce into the Bill a provision that no foreign seamen, with the exception of British subjects, shall be engaged on board British ships, unless in the opinion of a competent Board of Trade officer they are capable of understanding the word of command in the English language. I put it entirely on the ground of safety. There is nothing further that I wish to say about the foreign seamen, except this. I earnestly hope that British shipowners will assist us in trying to bring into existence or to promote some sort of scheme whereby the undoubted deficiency in the supply of British seamen can be, somehow or other, made good. I am quite certain that a good deal can be done by a system of apprenticeship. The firm with which my hon. friend the Member for Dewsbury is connected—than whom there is no man in this House more competent in matters affecting the merchant service—have a regular system of apprenticeship, which is working admirably. About 50 per cent. of the boys who are apprenticed eventually stick to their posts, and I think that that is about as high a percentage as you can really expect. I believe that the experiment which has been made such a success in my hon. friend's firm could be made a success in any other firm if a real effort were made. Here you have 40,000 berths at present filled by foreigners, according to the shipowners, because Britishers cannot be obtained. There would be an opening for some philanthropic trade unionist or tariff reformer who wished to find employment for British hands.

Then I come to another branch of the Bill, and that is in regard to food and the scale of provisions. At the present moment there is no statutory scale of provisions enforced upon shipowners. There is something which is known as the Board of Trade scale, but it is not a Board of Trade scale at all; it is purely a skeleton which the Board of Trade expect each owner to fill up for himself, but too often the skeleton has done the part of a real living scale. The "Board of Trade scale" is a sort of traditional scale: it is very little beyond salt meat, biscuits, tea, and sugar. It would be unfair to shipowners if I were to suggest that that is the scale of provisions which they give to their sailors. It is not. There is a conflict of evidence on this point; but I should say that the vast majority of shipowners not merely improve upon that scale, but improve upon it very considerably. Some shipowners, more especially on the great liners and the great tramp ships, provide as generous a scale as could be put into an Act of Parliament—I should say a better scale than you could possibly put into an Act of Parliament. But at the same time there is no doubt of this—that a very considerable minority of sailing-ship owners and tramp-ship owners do provide a scale for their seamen which is not much better, if at all, than this meagre, monotonous, miserable scale of salt beef, biscuits, tea, and sugar. I think that that is not the sort of thing which ought to be allowed. We have had considerable evidence with regard to desertions. The House will, I am sure, be surprised to know that in the course of a single year the desertions from the British mercantile marine amount to 28,000. According to some of the evidence, the desertions are due to a large extent to the monotony, the poverty, and the lack of variety of the food scale in some of the sailing ships. Another set of witnesses said that the difficulty which had been found in inducing men and boys to join the mercantile marine was very largely attributable to the fact that the food scale did not commend itself in many instances to the British working man. All that we say is this. The great majority of shipowners supply their sailors with excellent food, good in quality, admirable in quantity, and excellent as far as variety is concerned, taking into account that, after all, the sea is the sea, and that you cannot go out every morning and buy fresh meat and so on. Taking all these things into account, the vast majority of British shipowners do their duty by their seamen; and all that we say is that it is no reflection upon a trading community to introduce a law or a regulation that forces the recalcitrant members of that community to live up to the standard, as it were, of the majority of their fellow-traders. That is all that we do here. We say to these men who do not provide their sailors with the kind of food which ought to be given to them, "You must, at any rate, come up to the average of the British shipowners." There has been a great deal of complaint under this head. I do not want to read out too much of the evidence, but there is a case for introducing some sort of minimum scale of provisions. I will not refer merely to the evidence of seamen; the evidence given by sailors is practically unanimous on the point. But the evidence given by independent Board of Trade witnesses corroborates the evidence given by the sailors to a very large extent. There is the evidence given by Mr. Longford, who says that the cooking on sailing ships is, as a rule, wholly uncharacterised by skill. When we are so anxious to reduce the number of foreigners on our British ships and to increase the number of British sailors, one thing to do is to make the merchant service as attractive as we can, and the first condition undoubtedly is to provide fairly good food. The life of the seaman is a pretty hard one. His accommodation is cramped under the best of conditions; there is a kind of food which in the best service in the world he would have to get accustomed to; there is the absence from home, and the deprivation of all the comforts of home life. Under these circumstances it is not too much to ask that a minimum scale of provisions should be provided for these men, and the Government have decided in this Bill to have a minimum scale. But I do not think you can have a scale which you can rigidly enforce—a scale of so many pounds of this a week and so many ounces of that. It is quite impossible rigidly to enforce a scale in every particular. The only thing you can do is not to set up a scale, but to set up a standard, and the minimum scale which we introduce into this Bill is not so much a scale as a sort of standard to which we shall ask shipowners to conform. If a sailor complains that he has not had a fair share of the things provided in the scale and the shipowner can prove that he has had substitutes which are equivalent, then the sailor will be non suited. I think that that is fair on the whole; it is better for the sailor and better for the shipowner. I need not say that in many ports it would be quite impossible for the shipowner to provide the ship with some article included in the scale, and then he would be able to provide some substitute.

Then it follows almost as a matter of course that if we have a minimum scale of provisions we must have some provision with regard to cooking. The Committee recommended that the cooks should be certificated. I am told that the evidence is overwhelming that the cooking is bad as a rule, and that the cook is generally a man who is not fit for anything else. The result is that shipowners do not get justice done to them because of the badness of the cooking. The provisions which come before the sailors are dressed up in such a way as to look very much worse than they really are. Therefore we have decided to incorporate the recommendation of the Committee, and to say that cooks must go through some course of training. We give two years, so that all those who have been in the service two years will get their certificates as a matter of course; therefore, for some time sailors will have to put up with a good deal of bad cooking. My own opinion is that when you get these certificated cooks the shipowners themselves will feel that it is so much easier to attract and obtain a good class of men because of the excellence of the food, that they will infinitely prefer the certificated man to the experienced but inexpert cook of olden times. I do not think there is anything for shipowers to complain of in that. I have consulted them in regard to the minimum scale, and while they agree on the whole, they do not quite agree with the minimum scale we have suggested, but we think that we have struck a very fair compromise between the scale suggested by the sailors and that to which the Shipping Federation were prepared to agree. I think that on the whole our scale is not an extravagant one. Whenever I have put it to a shipowner he has always told me that his scale is better than that; therefore he cannot complain: he is always thinking of somebody else, not himself. But I think the standard in these matters ought to be set by the better class of shipowners. In their own interest and in the interest of the trade, the excellent example which they have set for forty years but which has not been followed by others ought to be enforced by Act of Parliament, and that is why we have introduced this provision into the Bill.

We are also going to extend the inspection of provisions. As hon. Members who are acquainted with the Merchant Shipping Act know perfectly well, provisions are inspected on vessels going to certain parts of the world—round Cape Horn, round the Cape of Good Hope, and through the Suez Canal; but there is no inspection of the provisions on vessels going to any other part of the globe. If you inspect the provisions in the one case, it is necessary to inspect them in the other, because, on the whole, the worst-provisioned ships are not those which go these long voyages. We are not going to make the inspection compulsory; we are going to say that the Board of Trade inspector may inspect provisions in every case—that he shall have the right to do so. A good many shipowners have told me that they regard this as a protection to themselves, as very often the store-keeper is to blame for palming off inferior stores upon the shipowner. That is what I am told by shipowners, at any rate, and they think the provision will act as a guarantee as to the quality of the food.

Then there is another thing. I am sorry to weary the House with all these details, but I want to explain the whole Bill. We are going to substitute new regulations for those which are found in some of the schedules of the old Acts. A good many of those regulations, with regard to the emigrant ships and the carrying of cattle, and so forth, are hopelessly antiquated; they were made for a state of things which does not at all obtain at the present day. In 1854, our ships were chiefly of wood and iron; they are now of steel; in 1854, our sailing ships were 4,000,000 tons and our steam only 300,000; in 1904, and it is going up every year, our steam had gone up to 8,750,000, and our sailing ships were only 1,800,000. It is quite clear that regulations applicable to the old days of sailing ships, when steam was only an experiment, would be inapplicable when steam is everything and the sailing ship is a declining and decaying quantity. Not only that, but in the old days you had not the huge mammoth concerns which you have now. For instance, in those days you had a regulation like this: you are not allowed to carry in an emigrant ship more than ten head of large cattle, including horses and asses. All that sort of thing is hopelessly inapplicable to the present state of our shipping, and what we propose is this. It is a great mistake, I think, to put into an Act of Parliament rigid rules which require another Act of Parliament before they can be altered. It is very difficult to carry Acts of Parliament nowadays, under any scheme, with the present congestion of business. That applies to the simplest Act of Parliament, even when you have the assent of practically the whole House—and that is a thing you cannot always get. One man raises his hat, and his hat is more potent than the voices of the remaining 669 of his fellow members; he simply has to object and the Bill is stopped. Therefore, it is inconvenient to require an amending Act of Parliament whenever a new regulation seems to be necessary to meet the changing circumstances of our mercantile marine. In ten or twenty years there may be as great changes in our mercantile marine as have taken place during the last twenty years. Who can foresee what may happen? There may be a totally different state of things existing, and what we want is to be able, by means of an Order in Council, if necessary, to introduce regulations applicable to the changing circumstances of the hour, without having to have constant resort to the House of Commons to obtain sanction for every change that may bo required. That is what we propose. We propose to abolish these schedules and to substitute for them regulations of that character.

Another thing that we propose to do is this. It is obviously impossible for shipowners under every condition to conform absolutely to every regulation made by the Board of Trade or laid down by an Act of Parliament. Circumstances are sometimes too strong for them; they have to carry on their business under very trying conditions. There is at present, in the Act of 1894, a sort of dispensing power. Where a shipowner has on the whole done his best to what the regulations demand of him, there is a power to dispense with the strict enforcement of the letter of the regulation—but it is only in certain circumstances. We propose to include in this Bill a rather wider dispensing power under which the Board of Trade may dispense with the strict enforcement of regulations of this character where it is perfectly clear that the shipowner has done everything the circumstances would allow to conform to the regulations or the law.

Another thing is this, and I hope this will be my last point. It is proposed to give power to the Board of Trade to set up Advisory Committees for the purpose of consultation with regard to regulations. The Board of Trade, in the last few years more especially, have set up Advisory Committees for the purposes of consultation in regard to load lines, safety appliances, and all sorts of things in regard to which the law has laid obligations upon our mercantile marine, and almost without exception those committees have proved to be of the greatest possible assistance to the Board in arriving at decisions satisfactory to all parties concerned. After all, no one wants to harass our great mercantile marine in the conduct of its business; but it must be subject to these regulations for the safety of human life or the protection of the sailor, whose guardian we are. But I think it is fair that the men who are interested, who have special knowledge and experience in matters of this character, should be consulted, and I propose, if this clause is carried, at once to invite gentlemen representing the various interests to form an Advisory Committee to assist the Board of Trade in framing these new regulations. They may also assist with regard to the food scale; there may be reason to vary that from time to time. In matters of this and other kinds such a Committee would be of undoubted assistance to the Board of Trade in framing regulations which would work satisfactorily.

There are other provisions which I will not stop now to explain, dealing with the title of ships to be registered—the Board of Trade will require proof that a ship is entitled to be registered as a British ship, because it is at any rate suggested that there are frauds at the present time—the bringing of certain rules in the Act of 1894 up to date, the property of seamen dying on board ship abroad, desertion and so forth; but I think that, on the whole, I have outlined the main provisions of the Bill. After the Second Reading I shall ask the House to refer the Bill to the Committee on Trade, where I hope, and I have no doubt that it will, be freely criticised. But I should be sorry if the Government were to bring to bear the pressure of their Whips to force the Committee to any conclusion against its will. For my part, I shall throw the Bill on the mercy of the Committee, as I think it is a great mistake to make every detail of a Bill a Government matter, and I trust that when it emerges from the Committee it will be a Bill which will be of benefit to all concerned in our mercantile marine—the greatest the world has ever seen.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894 to 1901."—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover): I wish to say that we have listened to the right hon. Gentleman's speech with intense interest. No apology was needed from him for detaining the House so long as he did. It was not only an interesting speech, but I think it will prove to be a memorable speech. It marks a stage on the road which leads away from the high and dry theory of free trade. I noticed the anxious care which the right hon. Gentleman took from time to time to assure us that all this interference on the part of the State was solely in the interest of human life and the safety of human limb. Did it occur to him whilst framing this interesting piece of legislation that the result might have a protective value? Has it never occurred to him either that, by interfering as much as he does interfere, he may, by putting disabilities on the freedom of trade in one country, be imposing disabilities upon those who compete with our trade? We have heard from a member of this Government — from one of the great protagonists of free trade—that some kinds of competition can be grossly unfair. And why—I quote the right hon. Gentleman's words:—"Why are British shipowners subjected to grossly unfair competition?" Because labour legislation, and very proper labour legislation, places some restrictions upon British shipowners which do not apply to the owners of foreign vessels who compete with us. How far is the President of the Board of Trade prepared to go on this path? We welcome his first footsteps along it. The salutary regulations of the Board of Trade are no doubt restricted so far as the shipowners are concerned. It costs them more to make a profit under these regulations than it costs shipowners who are not subjected to them. What about the Board of Trade regulations which apply to railways? The goods which come on a ship which is allowed to be unseaworthy come over a railway which is not subject to the regulations which apply to our railways. Is he prepared to say that notice will be taken of the fact that the platforms may be as short as you please on the railways of a foreign country?

*MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: They do not run in our country.

MR. WYNDHAM: But I presume the goods come partly by rail and partly by ship. Some regulations are to be imposed with respect to the sea-borne part of the voyage, but the railway part is a matter we need not take into account. But I do not want to discourage the President of the Board of Trade. We cannot expect his progress to be very rapid, but it is significant. Then he apologised almost to the Labour Party for not legislating directly at this stage against the employment of foreign seamen. We may hope for that in another year or two, when the education of the right hon. Gentleman has proceeded at the hands of the Labour Party, and then perhaps legislation will take direct notice of the fact that foreign seamen compete, and compete seriously, with our British mariners. The right hon. Gentleman says that if they got rid of foreign seamen they would ruin the mercantile marine. There is very little applause for that sentiment from hon. Gentlemen who sit below the gangway on the Opposition side. And so now the right hon. Gentleman is going to perform one of those manœuvres to which the orthodox is sometimes driven. The foreign seaman is to compete with the British seaman, but not unless he knows what starboard and larboard mean. And so a little incidental protection is given, for which no free trader, however orthodox, may have cause to blush. We do not complain only that foreign seamen are ignorant of our language, but we complain that some foreign captains and mates have too much knowledge of our coasts; and it is a matter to us of intense importance that now you are looking into this business you should see that the British pilot, who goes through an expensive training to take out a certificate, is not robbed of the fruits of his industry by foreigners, even though they do know our language, which they have studied in our estuaries and channels. Then the President of the Board of Trade went on very effectively to say that seamen ought to be properly fed—that the Board of Trade scale was a skeleton at their feast, and so forth. But he was going to deal with this matter very cautiously, even in respect of British seamen. I have got one Question to ask him: is he going to look after the meals of the seamen on foreign ships which compete with British ships?

* Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: Which?

Mr. WYNDHAM: In foreign ships.

* Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: Name one.

Mr. WYNDHAM: I do not see the force of the remark.

* Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: It makes all the difference in the world. If the right hon. Gentleman will name a foreign country that has not got a minimum scale, I will answer him.

Mr. WYNDHAM: Will the right hon. Gentleman seek to establish equality in that respect? He has told us, so far as unseaworthiness and over-loading go, that he is going to apply to foreign vessels which come to our ports the regulations which apply to British vessels. I merely asked him whether, when he was arranging for the British mariner's meals, he would also see that the mariner on the foreign vessel had as good a meal? Why have equality in respect of over-loading and unseaworthiness if the foreign competitor is allowed to economise on the meals taken on the competing vessel?

*Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: The United States of America have a much higher minimum scale than I propose to introduce here. France has got a minimum scale, so has Germany—or at any rate at its principal seaports—and Denmark, Sweden, and practically all the foreign countries in the world except ours.

Mr. WYNDHAM: What I asked the right hon. Gentleman was—and I repeat the question—whether he will see that our scale is not superior to the scales of other countries. I now come to the last part of the speech, to which I invite the serious attention of the House. You cannot pick and choose amongst these regulations by saying some insure safety of life and limb. If once you begin to interfere with freedom of trade you have abandoned free trade, and you must take a general view of the whole facts of your interference with that trade, and so the right hon. Gentleman will discover. But when I ask him whether in respect of his regulations as to food he will see that equality is maintained, he is not in a position to answer me, because he is going to give up his power, as I understand, in a large measure to such counsels as he may receive from advisory boards.

*Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: No.

Mr. WYNDHAM: He is going to withdraw the power from this House, and that is a matter of immense importance, and even on the first bringing in of the Bill we cannot afford to pass it over without some solemn word of warning. As I understand it, these regulations and schedules are to be changed by Order in Council. That is a constitutional change of grave moment, and although it would not be proper at this stage of the Bill to express any opinion upon that, still I think the right hon. Gentleman must be warned that to withdraw questions of this kind, in which the public is more interested perhaps now than in any other questions, from discussion in this House and to reserve to a bureaucracy the power of altering conditions of labour on British ships is a grave constitutional question; and when, in addition, you withdraw the power from this House and transfer it to a Government Department, and say that the head of the Department is going to reserve to himself a right of dispensation, and that certain ships which find favour with high Government officials are not to be interfered with, and that others not so fortunate are to be interfered with, that is a power of dispensation of which our ancestors in this country have always been jealous, and of which we shall be jealous when the Bill is brought in.

*MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down gave us, I think, a very humorous speech. I did not expect that he would have dealt with this very serious question in that way, and I fail to see how he could with reason work in the question of tariff reform. However, it is quite evident that hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition side, whenever they can put in a word to bolster up tariff reform intend to do so. There was only one serious point on which, I think, the right hon. Gentleman touched, and that was the last one of all, in which he dealt with the subject of advisory committees. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover that that is a very serious and a very dangerous proposal, because I can imagine that a Liberal Government might make very liberal regulations, and in the course of time we might have a change of Government, and I can imagine a Conservative Government being very ready to alter the regulations to suit the convenience of some of their numerous friends. Therefore it would not, in my opinion, be to the advantage of the seamen. Something of the kind has been going on during the past twelve months with regard to load line regulations. By Order in Council, the Board of Trade are empowered to make certain alterations, and within five years the shipowners without coming before the House of Commons, without the matter being discussed or adopted in the House of Commons in any shape or form, have had two goes at the load line, with the result that ships are now carrying more cargo than they carried previously; and only two days ago the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had to sanction certain regulation that had already been practically adopted by the late Government or the late President of the Board of Trade, which regulations have not been submitted to this House, with the result that shipowners are now able to load their ships deeper than they could before those regulations came into operation. Therefore I think the right hon. Gentleman did score a point with regard to Advisory Committees. If the Government would make the Committees equal in representation—if they would give the seamen, and shipmasters, and officers the same representation on the Committee as the shipowners — then I am sure that the seamen and the officers would certainly be able to hold their own. But I have had twenty-six years experience of Advisory Committees, and I generally find that they are composed of shipowners, insurance brokers, who are largely interested in shipping property, and a number of other people interested in ships, and then, as a kind of makeweight, they throw on a seamen or a fireman, who is practically helpless, and whose voice exerts no influence on the Committee. If the Advisory Committee gives equal representation for all parties, then I would not say that the proposal would be so dangerous. With regard to the speech of the President of the Board of Trade, I desire in the name of the seamen of this country to thank him and the Government for making one step forward in the right direction. I always believe in the policy of taking all you can get and then asking for more. The proposals of the right hon. Gentleman do not satisfy me by any means. Take the whole of his proposals and they amount to very little indeed. Certainly there are one or two very important points. First of all with regard to the application of English regulations to foreign ships. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Dover has an idea that by adopting what the Government now propose we are taking a step in the direction of protection. May I assure him that the law has been the same for the last twenty years, and under it foreign ships are now subjected to the English law with regard to the carrying of deck loads of timber to English ports in the winter months. That law has been in operation for over twenty years, so that it is not a new principle, but simply a matter of understanding the principle which has been recognised for many years. The same with regard to the loading of ships. We have always had the power to interfere with foreign ships when loading in British ports, but as the right hon. Gentleman pointed out very clearly—as I think every hon. Gentleman interested in shipping will understand—there is the responsibility of the officer detaining a ship which has no mark or anything to guide him; and it might turn out that the ship was not overladen, and then the owner would be entitled to heavy damages. Therefore it is necessary to have the load line on the side of the vessel, so that at a glance the Board of Trade officer may be able to satisfy himself whether or not the ship is all right and in proper trim. I cannot see that this has anything at all to do with free trade or protection. [AN HON. MEMBER: It is fair trade.] Well, we will allow it to be that, but it is a question of the protection of life and limb, and it is not a question of giving British ships any advantage. We are simply asking that the same law which applies to a British vessel shall apply to a foreign vessel in our own ports. I do not know whether my right hon. friend intends this Bill to apply to ports outside the United Kingdom—I mean to our Colonies. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will seriously consider this point.

* MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I cannot.

* MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I cannot legislate for the Colonies.

* MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: Some of the Colonies are in advance of our own law upon this question; Australia and New Zealand, especially, are well ahead of us. I see no reason, however, why the right hon. Gentleman should not apply this condition to India, because the Imperial Merchant Shipping Act is bound to have an effect upon all ships trading in Indian ports. I do not think there is any question about that. I think the proposal of the Government to bring foreign ships coming into British ports under our regulations with regard to life-saving appliances, loading and the load line, is a step in the right direction. With regard to the President of the Board of Trade's remarks about foreigners and lascars, I am sorry that I cannot follow him—in fact, I do not agree with him at all. First as regards the foreigners. The right hon. Gentleman said that as far as the figures he had got went, the number of foreigners on board British ships was 40,000; but if my right hon. friend was to put another 20,000 on the top of that, I think he would be nearer the mark, because it must be borne in mind that there are hundreds and thousands of foreigners who have British names, and as a matter of fact, claim to be Britishers. I have seen a foreigner who could scarcely speak a word of our language sign an English name, and he told the British officer in charge that he was a native of Penarth. It must, therefore, be taken for granted that, in addition to the number mentioned by the President of the Board of Trade, there are a number of other foreign seamen. I wish it to be understood that I raise no objection to foreign seamen. I do not object to any man on the ground of his nationality or his colour, but what I do say is that foreign seamen have no right to be given employment which they are not competent to perform. Again, it is not right in principle that foreign seamen should be used for the purpose of lowering the conditions of employment of our own men in our own country. I have given a good deal of consideration and thought to this question for many years, and I do not agree with my right hon. friend when he says that the reason why the foreigner has been brought in is because the shipowner is unable to get British seamen. Let me draw a distinction for the moment between the sailor and the fireman. We are always hearing a good deal about the boy sailor. I wish to speak about the fireman, because it must be borne in mind that the firemen on board British steamers are more numerous than sailors. I think I am right in stating that there are a much larger number of firemen than sailors employed under present conditions. Therefore, I do not see the force of always talking about taking apprentices to create boy sailors. In my opinion the stokers ought to be the great question for us to consider on board ship. The President of the Board of Trade appeared to think that there has been a great increase in the mercantile marine, and that in consequence the supply of seamen has not kept up to the demand. I would like to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that we have less sailors now than we had twenty-five years ago. I may say that twenty-five years ago the number of sailors in the mercantile marine was over 300,000, and now there are not more than 240,000. The reason of it is that there has been a great change from sailing ships to steam ships, and therefore the fireman has come in to take the place of a large number of the sailors and deck hands who have been displaced. But it is nonsense in my opinion to say that the shipowner has been obliged to resort to the employment of foreigners because he could not get Britishers; that is not so. I have seen in almost every seaport in this country hundreds of British seamen who could not get employment, and as a matter of fact, if a sailor can get employment upon another ship, within six weeks of leaving his old vessel, he is a very fortunate man indeed. For every sailor that is required in any seaport town you will find at least nine or ten who want employment, and that is the state of affairs that has prevailed for the last twenty years. There has never been a scarcity of British seamen, and I say to the shipowners in this House, that if they want to fill their ships with British seamen and firemen they can do it to-morrow without any difficulty whatever. Let us take some of the principal lines; take, for example, the Cunard Line. Have they any trouble in getting British seamen? Take the White Star Line. Have they any trouble in getting all the British seamen and firemen they require? The same applies to the Union Castle Line, and any other firm of shipowners. I am not arguing that foreigners should not be employed; all I say is that if a foreigner is employed on board a British ship he ought to conform to our standard; he ought to be a qualified sailor or fireman, and he ought to be able to understand the ordinary language used on board a ship in giving orders. The cases that I have brought before the House of Commons from time to time of the class of crews that have been engaged at ports on the Continent for British ships reveal a perfect scandal. I have brought under the notice of this House cases in which fourteen and fifteen men have been engaged on a British ship in Antwerp, and eleven or twelve of them have been men of different nationalities, not one of whom was able to understand a word of our language. Can we wonder that ships are lost when manned under such conditions as those? Then I would like to ask what necessity is there for the discharge of crews in foreign ports? The right hon. Gentleman says the shipowners cannot help this, and that it is not a question of wages; but I say emphatically, in the presence of shipowners in this House, that there is one reason, and one reason only, why they discharge their crews in Antwerp, Hamburg and Rotterdam, and that reason is that they may get men at a lower rate of wages. Let any shipowner contradict that statement if he can. The Articles of Agreement for these men are drawn up for the final port of discharge to be a port in the United Kingdom; and when they discharge the men on the Continent, it is because the wages at Continental ports are about 20s. a month less than in British ports. I do not make that statement with a view of making grave charges against shipowners. I do not wish to give offence to any hon. Gentleman interested in shipping, but I do say that I am not going to have it said that the reason for the employment of such a large number of aliens in our ships is that they cannot get any other class of labour. I cannot possibly tolerate such statements being made when I know that they are a long way off being true. With regard to the lascar, I have no objection to lascars being employed whatever. I agree with some of my hon. friends who say that the lascar is a Britisher, but what about the lascars who are not Britishers? How many thousands of them have we on board our British ships who are not Britishers? What about the Chinamen included on board British ships? When were they made British, and what part of the British Empire do they come from? I noticed that there was a great cheer went up from the tariff reformers when the right hon. Gentleman spoke about the lascars being Britishers, and when he said that they ought to have more consideration than the aliens. I would say, however, that if you put the lascar's wages up to the standard of the alien, the lascar will no longer be required, although he is a Britisher. What I want with regard to the lascars is this. I want them to have the same conditions on board British ships that Britishers obtain. I want them to have the same accommodation as white men. As a matter of fact, according to the evidence given before the Mercantile Marine Commission, Dr. Collingridge, the medical officer of the Port of London, said, when questioned as to whether a lascar required as much space as a white man, that he required more space, because he was physically weaker. And yet we have shipping companies getting large subsidies from the Government who are employing lascars and giving them between forty and fifty cubic feet of space instead of seventy-two feet. We would have had 120 cubic feet as recommended by the Royal Commission had it not been that the Board of Trade would not offend the P. and O. Company by making a proposal to increase the accommodation. We could have increased accommodation for the white man if we would leave the lascar outside. I can see that the policy of that is to give them better facilities for employing coloured labour. With regard to the Chinaman, the right hon. Gentleman did not make any degrees when he talked of lascars, but he included, I suppose, all Asiatics. But the Chinaman is not a British subject, as far as I am aware, unless he hails from Hongkong, and I suppose they all come from Hongkong when they are on board a British ship. In dealing with the question of the language test, will the right hon. Gentleman deal with the Chinaman from Hongkong? He ought to know something of the English language at least. If all of them do not understand it, at least a proportion of them do. I have had some experience in this Chinese flood, as I call it, because British seamen have been gradually done out of employment on board British ships, largely by Chinamen whom I look upon as a greater danger than foreigners. I hope the right hon. Gentleman in bringing the Bill forward will not forget that. Then, with reference to the food scale, at last the long looked-for comes. I have been looking for this food scale for a long time now, and certainly I have made a good many speeches in the House of Commons with regard to it. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman has not, as far as I can judge, made it as liberal as it ought to be. I was sorry to hear him say that it is on a lower standard than that of the United States of America. I think we ought to feed our seamen as well as those of the United States are fed, and I am rather surprised that we are not going to have such a good scale: why, I do not understand. The shipowners and other gentlemen interested in shipping to whom I have talked in regard to this matter have all assured me that they pay not less than 1s. 6d. per day per man for feeding the crews. The food recommended by Sir Francis Jeune's Committee only cost 1s. 1d. per day, so that the shipowners evidently are going to have 5d. per day out of this scale; 5d. per day is a consideration.

*MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: No.

*MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: The right hon. Gentleman says that they are not going to save 5d. per day. I know that the scale of Sir Francis Jeune's Committee will only cost 1s. 1d., and I do know that if the shipowners say they now pay 1s. 6d., then they are going to get 5d. per day.

*MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: My hon. friend will see that the cost of food depends on how it is calculated. Are you going to calculate 1s. 6d. per day as the price here, or taking the voyage all round? It is very difficult to arrive at the price, because the cost depends upon whether you calculate here or make the provision for all over the voyage.

*MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Well, it will be nothing like 5d. per day.

*MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: I do not know that. I say that if a shipowner states that he is now paying 1s. 6d. per day, and that the new scale will only cost 1s. 1d., it will be a disadvantage to the seamen. It is time that we had a food scale, because there has been a great deal of dissatisfaction on board ship, and I think it is largely due to the unsatisfactory scale in existence since 1854. I am sure that the majority of the shipowners of this country feed their men well. It was only the other day that I asked a sailor who had been in the line, "What kind of food have you had?" "Well," he said, "we could not have had it better." But there are a minority to whom 8d. per day would be an extravagant price to pay. They are in the hands of the ship's stores dealer, and I say that very often indeed he is the worst chap of the whole lot. I heard of a case, and I have every reason to believe it is true, of a certain ship's stores dealer who opened the casks of beef and took so many pieces out of each cask, and in that way made up additional casks. Each cask contains 312 lbs., but in this case there was only about 270 lbs. Now, the steward is responsible for 312 lbs., and by-and-bye the beef begins to get down, and the captain begins to grumble at the steward when the beef is disappearing so rapidly. The steward has to clip a bit off the men every day to make it spin out. I think that the Board of Trade, when they inspect provisions, should also weigh them and see that the proper weight is in each cask. That would be a safeguard to the shipowners and protect their interests. A shipowner cannot always be present. He may have a ship loading in Liverpool, and he does not wish to trouble to go down there to see after the beef; but if he could know that the Government Department was seeing after not only the quality, but also the weight of the provisions put on board the ship, I think it would be an advantage to shipowners generally. May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to carry the inspection a little further? At the present time the Board of Trade inspect only certain portions of the provisions, such as beef and pork, bread and flour. I cannot see why the whole of the provisions should not be subjected to inspection. Butter, tea, and coffee should also be inspected. I got a sample of butter from a ship the other day and I took it to an analyst. He thought it was cart grease. I showed it to one or two Members of this House and the smell of it was sufficient for them. One gentleman was going to venture to taste it, but I advised him otherwise. That butter had in all probability been purchased abroad. In all probability the shipowners did pay for butter, though it was not butter. The seamen who are supplied with provisions of that kind are getting food which is not fit for human consumption, and there ought to be some authority to whom they might appeal, and a prosecution should take place in the same way as would be the case on shore. With regard to cooks, I think the right hon. Gentleman has touched a very sore point on board ship. The food has not been very plentiful on some of these tramps which we have condemned severely; but when they have an inferior cook that makes matters worse, and I think the proposal that cooks should have certificates is a very good thing indeed. I trust that the right hon. Gentleman will make the Bill cover as many points as possible. I do not want to ruin the shipping trade, I can assure the right hon. Gentleman of that: I want to help the shipping trade if I can; but, at the same time, I want to see a body of men in the mercantile marine that this country will be proud of, and I want to know that those men have something like fair conditions.

MR. BRACE (Glamorganshire, S.): I desire to associate myself with the expression of opinion which has been given by my hon. friend the Member for Middlesbrough. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade upon the introduction of this Bill, which refers to a number of matters which show that human life after all is of some value to this country. As I understand the Bill, it has been introduced for the purpose of affording better protection to the lives of our sailors than is given at the present time. I welcome gladly the provision that seamen shall not be employed on British ships in future unless they have full understanding of the language, so that they may understand the orders given to them by their officers. May I venture to express the hope that the House of Commons will also later on carry out the same principle in connection with the mines of this country? A similar provision ought to be made by which alien miners — the Poles in Scotland — who do not understand the English language should be prevented from going into mines until they have learned the language sufficiently to understand the orders that are given; otherwise danger is involved not only to themselves but to the whole of the men employed. I was very surprised to hear the statement of the right hon. Gentleman that there is a shortage of British sailors. I represent the constituency of Barry Dock, perhaps the greatest export dock in the world, and I have found continuous complaints of unemployment by Britishers there. I have also found a similar complaint at Carnarvon. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade stated that the reason why alien sailors are employed is that there is a shortage of British sailors. Probably later on I shall have an opportunity of going more closely into this and inquiring into the actual facts of the case. My experience, like that of the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, is that there are plenty of British sailors conditionally, that is, if the shipowners are prepared to pay the wages. It is largely a question of wages. There is no inducement under the present rate for a Britisher to go to sea if he can get work on land at all. One cannot be surprised under these circumstances that men will not go to sea, with all its dangers and discomforts, if they can get better wages on land. I therefore ask the President of the Board of Trade to give some attention to the question of wages which these men should enjoy; and I ask him, in reference to foreign sailors on British ships, that he should also lay down the law that alien seamen and firemen shall be paid at the same rate of wages as British sailors and firemen. I notice that provision is made for inpecting the provisions supplied to the sailors. That is very proper; but why not inspect the ships as well which are in course of repair in British docks? During the last day or two I have had a considerable correspondence with workmen interested in the shipbuilding industry, and they inform me that for want of local inspection by practical men many ships have been sent out of dock after repair which would not have been allowed to be sent, if they had been properly examined. Statements have been made to me—I do not vouch for their absolute accuracy—that some of the plates in some of these repaired ships were as thin as a shilling. Therefore, I venture to hope that the right hon. the President of the Board of Trade will follow up the close inspection which ought to be made of the food by a more exacting inspection of the vessels in course of repair than is provided for at the present time. In regard to what the right hon. Member for Dover has said on the question of alien pilots, I am not aware that it will be touched by this Bill, although I think that it should be. There is a real national danger in allowing masters and first officers of foreign ships being granted pilots' certificates to bring foreign ships into British ports, if their ships trade with these ports regularly. In Russia, Germany, France, and many other maritime countries, there are a sufficient number of men regularly working in these foreign mercantile ships who could pilot a foreign Navy into British ports. Therefore, if no provision has been made in this Bill to prevent that, I hope the right hon. Gentleman will do what has been asked for for many years, namely, provide that every vessel coming into a British port shall be piloted by British citizens, by men whom we can trust. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman opposite if this question is so important as the right hon. Member for Dover now says it is, why did not the late Government do anything to remedy the evil when they had the power? I understand that the pilots in British ports have, by deputation and petition, been pleading with successive Presidents of the Board of Trade to do something to abolish what, in my judgment, is a very serious danger to the nation. I welcome the introduction of this Bill and support its principle, with the reservation that when it comes into Committee we shall be at liberty to move any necessary Amendments.

*SIR ROBERT ROPNER (Stockton): In reference to what the hon. Member for South Glamorganshire who has just sat down has said in regard to the repairing of ships in dock, I may say that vessels nowadays are nearly all classified. There is not a single steamer or sailing vessel now being repaired in this country which is not properly inspected by the Surveyors of Classification Committees. I should like to congratulate the President of the Board of Trade on the manner in which he has dealt with the recommendations of the three Committees of which this Bill is the outcome. I think he has dealt with these recommendations in a very judicious and fair manner. I can only say that I was glad to hear his concluding remark that this is not a political question. It is not a political question, and I do hope I shall have the sympathy not only of hon. Members on this side of the House, but of hon. Members on the Ministerial Benches, when I say that we shipowners come here not to differ from the President of the Board of Trade, but to congratulate him, and to endeavour to make this Bill as good a measure as it can be made. The Bill, I believe, will do away with the necessity for any further legislation for fifteen or twenty years, for it is very much to be deprecated when there is continued interference with any trade. No trade can prosper when there is a fear that something will be done by way of legislation to interfere with it. We are all aware of the importance of the mercantile marine to this country. If it were not for that mercantile navy I do not think that our country and Empire would be what it is to-day; and therefore there ought to be sympathy with the men who carry on that trade, and they should be dealt with in a fair manner. Of course, we have in the mercantile navy passenger liners, but we do not look upon them as the whole of the mercantile marine. They constitute only 10 per cent. of that navy. The main part of it is made up by the so-called tramp steamers, which carry cargo all over the world. These are the mainstay of our mercantile navy. As the President of the Board of Trade has pointed out, this measure naturally divides itself into two sections, one to remedy some of the evils under which the British shipowners have suffered for many years, and the other to improve the conditions of seamen employed on British ships. British shipowners welcome the provisions which will put foreign vessels under the same restrictions with regard to overloading, seaworthiness, and equipment, as British, and also as to the regulations with regard to the carrying of passengers. In regard to the load line, I should like to say that, though in future, if this Bill passes, foreign steamers in our ports are to be dealt with in the same manner as those belonging to our own country, that is not the whole difficulty under which we labour. It is only in the ports of the United Kingdom that they will be interfered with. They will have the same freedom as at present all over the world to carry much greater cargoes than British ships can. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade that no British legislation can remedy this; but we British shipowners shall do our best in the future as in the past to meet this unfair competition. I now wish to say a few words in regard to what a good many shipowners in this country will no doubt think the prejudicial part of the Bill. The clause making it impossible hereafter for sailors to be employed on our vessels who have not a sufficient knowledge of English seems right, and I, for one, am perfectly agreeable to that; and I am perfectly certain that a large majority of British shipowners are quite agreeable to have a law of that description. I think it is only right that the men manning our ships should understand the orders given to them, but I would warn the President of the Board of Trade not to make that clause too drastic. Everything depends upon the man who has the supervision of the signing on of sailors. I hope that when the Bill passes it will only put a stop to the engagement of sailors who cannot understand sufficiently the orders which are given to them, otherwise it might be difficult to employ foreigners on board of British vessels at all, and in spite of what has been said by the hon. Member for Middlesbrough, I am of opinion, speaking from the experience of many years, that there is not a sufficient number of British sailors to man all our ships. If we were only carrying on the trade of our own country there might be a sufficient number of British sailors, but seeing that we are actually the intermediaries of the trade between foreign countries, it is quite impossible that we should be able to find a sufficient number of British sailors to man all the British ships at sea. I admit that there may be occasions when there are British sailors in British ports unemployed, and that some owners may give a preference to foreign sailors. But I am told to-day for the first time that the cause of that is the lower wages paid to foreign sailors.

*MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: I did not say that the foreign seamen accepted lower wages than British seamen in the United Kingdom. What I said was that foreign seamen accepted lower wages than British seamen in Continental ports.

*SIR ROBERT ROPNER: I accept that explanation; but what I say is that foreign sailors when engaged in this country get exactly the same wages on British ships as British seamen. There is no truth in the allegation that the foreign sailors are engaged in this country because they accept lower wages than our own men. I should like to say a few words in reply to what the hon. Member said as to the statutory scale of provisions. I speak again from experience, and I say that the food scale which is at present being employed by most of the shipowners costs something like a minimum of 1s. 3d. per day, and the food scale which is now being introduced by the Board of Trade will cost the shipowner an additional 3d. a day per man more than he has been accustomed to pay. The additional 3d. a day per man means £100 a year for a tramp steamer manned by twenty-five hands. Even £100 a year is a great consideration to a good many tramp steamship owners who cannot protect themselves by forming themselves into syndicates, conferences, and trusts, and who have to go into the open markets to do the best they can. Seeing that there is a great deal of competition by foreign steamships, it is a most difficult matter sometimes to secure freights with which you can pay your way, and to pay something like £100 more for food when you are aware that you are giving as much in the way of food as any workman in this country gets, and more than our sailors get under the food scale in the Navy, seems to me a little hard. I do not think that shipowners should be called upon to give a better scale than exists at present. Nevertheless, here again we are quite ready to do what is reasonable, and if this House thinks that the food scale proposed by the President of the Board of Trade is a fair one, I shall be the last one to say a word against it. I hope that the proposal will be generally accepted in that spirit by the shipowners of the country, but I repeat that the scale as now drawn is a better one than required, especially as I know that the hon. Member for Middlesbrough himself a few years ago would have been glad to have accepted a scale of a lower description. The next point I have to deal with is the inspection of provisions and water. There is no reason whatever why provisions and water should not be inspected. All shipowners are anxious to see that good provisions are put on board. This is naturally the case as we have to pay for them, and I am glad to learn that the Bill provides that not only shall the shipowners be responsible for bad stores, but that the storekeeper who supplies them shall also be liable. As to the scheme for providing certificated cooks, I am not quite sure whether the time before this Bill will come into operation is long enough to enable us to make certain that when the moment comes for this provision to come into operation we shall have sufficient certificated cooks in the country to supply the demand. We are told, however, that the President of the Board of Trade will have power to make new regulations, and I have no doubt that in this matter also he will have power to meet the difficulties of the shipowners should they arise. I think I have touched upon everything of importance in the Bill. I entirely approve of the intention of the President of the Board of Trade to have an Advisory Committee. Who are the people in the country who are best able to give good advice, and able to judge what is best for this shipping industry but those who are engaged in the trade and who are fighting its daily battle? Therefore I say it is a very wise thing that an Advisory Committee of that kind should be called into existence. It is another question whether the Board of Trade should receive the power which the President is going to take, to make new regulations without the consent of the House being obtained, and this is a question which the House itself must decide. In conclusion I should like to finish as I commenced. I do hope that this Bill will be looked at not only from the political point of view, but from the trade point of view, and that it will emerge from this House fashioned in such a manner that it will give entire satisfaction not only to the shipowners themselves, but also to the men whom they employ.

MR. JENKINS (Chatham): I must join with my hon. friends in congratulating the President of the Board of Trade upon the presentation of his Bill, but I should like to put one or two questions to the right hon. Gentleman which I have tried to formulate as carefully as possible. I understood him to say that lascars were British subjects, and I quite agree that that is so. But with regard to the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman when he dealt with the question of foreigners on board British ships and suggested what the Government intended to do in order to dispose of the difficulties which have been encountered very recently, and especially in connection with several wrecks that have taken place on our coasts, I should like to put a query to him. The right hon. Gentleman is going to provide that a clause shall be inserted in his Bill whereby the Board of Trade official when the crew are being signed on is to satisfy himself that the foreigner is able to understand the British language. That is a provision which I entirely agree with, but lascars, although they are British subjects, do not understand the British language. I myself have worked on board ship, where, going into the forecastle of the ship, you would find thirty or forty of these men, not one of whom could understand a word of English. I do not know whether the same conditions are to be observed when the lascar is shipped on board British vessels, as are to be observed in the case of foreigners. If the right hon. Gentleman when he replies will bear that point in mind I shall be exceedingly obliged to him. I am not going to say one word about the provisions except in so far as the inspection is concerned. I understand from the President of the Board of Trade that an inspector will be appointed to carry out not in regard to part but in regard to the whole of the ships, what is being done at the present time in regard to a part. On certain ships the provisions are being inspected according to the principle laid down by the President of the Board of Trade for certain voyages. Now we have from the President of the Board of Trade a proposal that the inspectors of that body "may" inspect, and whilst I have every respect for and agree with the general remarks of the right hon. Gentleman, "may" to me is a word which is very permissive, and I do not myself believe in Acts of Parliament where there are too many "mays." This word is very often interpreted in a very wrong way. I happen to be a member of one of the Local Marine Boards of this country. I am a lay member, and have been appointed by the Board of Trade, but nearly all the other members of our Local Marine Board are shipowners. It is the same throughout the country, and I would respectfully suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he should consider this matter and give a fairer representation to seamen on the Local Marine Board. This would do away with the suspicion which is created in the minds of the seamen by the fact that nine-tenths of the members of those Boards are directly connected with or interested in shipping. In other respects I trust the President of the Board of Trade will not make this Act too permissive. I should also like to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that he has omitted to consider one important post on board a ship. I refer to ships' carpenters. There is no compulsion upon a ship to carry a ship's carpenter, but where there are ships' carpenters no provision is made for their examination. At the present time a system prevails whereby a man is shipped on board a vessel not as a carpenter, but he is termed "seaman and carpenter." There is a very old saying that no man can serve two masters, and he certainly cannot be at the same time a seaman and a carpenter. This method of shipping him is adopted from the economical standpoint and not for the purposes of securing safety. I say that the President of the Board of Trade should do by the carpenter what he does by the engineer. You will not enter into your dockyards or into the ships of the Navy a carpenter unless he passes an examination, and if you insist upon that in the Navy and the dockyards, why should not care be taken that thoroughly trained men, conversant with the technicalities of ship-building, are employed on board other ships? There are many technical matters upon which in case of emergency it is necessary that the ship's carpenter should be fully instructed. I thank the President of the Board of Trade for having brought forward this Bill, and for suggesting that it should not be dealt with by means of any hard and fast line. He says that he is willing to receive all that he can get in the way of opinion from this House, and that with the assistance of the House of Commons he will endeavour to carry a Bill which shall be suitable, and which shall at any rate in every way be practicable and possible. Therefore I appeal to him to insert in the Bill a clause as to the carpenters on board ship, that they shall pass a qualifying examination, showing that they have served their apprenticeship to the trade, and that they are able in a practical way to demonstrate their ability, and in a theoretical way to explain all that is necessary for the safeguarding of a vessel at sea.

MR. H. H. MARKS (Kent, Thanet): The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has to-day dealt in a very sympathetic manner with a matter of great importance and of increasing interest. The Bill which the right hon. Gentleman has introduced has been awaited with very great expectation and interest, but judging from what we have heard this afternoon those expectations are not likely to be fully realised, though there is reason to hope they will not be entirely disappointed. It was hoped that the President of the Board of Trade would have been able to see his way to do something to prohibit or restrict the employment of aliens, not only as seamen, but also as captains, officers, and petty officers, and as pilots in British waters. With regard to the employment of aliens as seamen, the Bill which is to be introduced proposes to deal only with the fringe of a great question, and that very lightly, by what is called the language test. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has suggested one reason for not dealing with this question on its merits. He says there is some doubt as to whether there are a sufficient number of Englishmen to man the ships now largely manned by foreigners. On that point I admit there may be some doubt, although the information that I have gathered does not confirm the view that there is any great shortage of Englishmen for this purpose. On the contrary there is strong evidence that if Englishmen are wanted they can readily be obtained. But however that may be, if it should hereafter appear that the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman was not accurate, and that the employment of aliens was not due to the lack of British seamen, I do not gather that, under this Bill, he would be able to deal with that subject. That seems to me to be a serious defect in the Bill. If we are to have provisions dealing with foreign emigrant ships calling at English ports, dealing with the load line; with the carrying of life saving apparatus; with the storing of grain; with the food scale; and in addition to all these provisions the Board of Trade proposes to take powers for the purpose of modifying certain existing regulations. It seems to me a great pity that the right hon. Gentleman does not cast his net a little wider, and take powers to deal with the question of the employment of aliens in the mercantile marine, and with the question of granting pilot certificates to aliens in competition with British pilots, many of whom have served an apprenticeship of twelve years before they could aspire to the responsible and remunerative position which is practically within the grasp of any foreigner who has had six months experience in our waterways. Another point which might have been considered, but which I think that the right hon. Gentleman has not considered, is the question of the discharge of British seamen in foreign ports. That is a question that presses for treatment at the present time, not only because it indirectly affects the whole question of the employment of alien seamen, but also because it leaves British seamen stranded in foreign parts and leads to great hardship. Among other things it leads to the spending by British seamen discharged at foreign ports of their accumulated wages, which would otherwise reach their families to be spent in England. No adequate facilities are afforded to seamen to send their wages to their families at home. It is true that there is some arrangement by which the wages may be sent home through the British Consuls, but the charges made by the Consuls are excessive. They amount to something like 3d. in the £, which is about four or five times as much as the ordinary banker charges for a similar accommodation. In the year 1904, at the four ports of Antwerp, Dunkirk, Rotterdam, and one other whose name I do not recollect, 27,674 British seamen were paid off, and only 4,134 remitted their wages home. Out of the £232,000 which was paid to them in wages, only £54,000 was transmitted to England. I submit that that is a matter that might well engage the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade and power, to deal with it should be included in the powers he now proposes to take for the Board of Trade. I do not say that we should not be thankful for the language test, and accept it with gratitude for what it is worth, but whether it would be feasible to have a Board of Trade official in every seaport of the world in order to secure that no alien should be shipped who did not understand the English language is a point which we can only find out in practice. No captain short-handed in a foreign port would be very hard to satisfy as to the knowledge of English by a foreigner desiring to join his crew. No seaman who had been doing double duty owing to the ship being undermanned would be very critical on the point. The complaint I make against the Bill is that its policy is the policy of personal restriction, whereas powers of general restriction (subject to Parliamentary control) would enable the Board of Trade to deal with each and every grievance as it arises. Instead of a language test the Bill should provide general powers to impose such tests or restrictions as circumstances might show to be desirable. The Board of Trade might take powers to make regulations—as it has made collision regulations—instead of having to come to this House on each occasion with a proposal for new legislation. To take such powers would not necessarily prejudge the question of their application. The new regulations would lie on the Table of the House and would be subject to Parliamentary sanction. They would commit neither Parliament nor the Board of Trade to anything, but at the same time the plea of having no power could no longer be made the ground for non-interference. One of the chief objections to this Bill is that while it only touches very lightly the fringe of this important question it will be counted in the future as a measure dealing with the whole question. However ineffective it may prove to be—and I hope it will not prove to be very ineffective—it will be brought forward for years to come as a reason for not further dealing with the Merchant Shipping Acts. It may therefore, while doing very little good now, be the means of preventing much good being done in the near future. We hear much of the pressure of time in this House, and the right hon. Gentleman has said very truly that it is very difficult to carry an Act of Parliament whenever a change of regulations is required. For that very reason, therefore, I would urge upon him now to put in this Bill all that may be required in the near future; to include in it all the subjects that he and the past Presidents of the Board of Trade have had pressed upon their attention. It has been said by the right hon. Gentleman and his predecessors in office, and notably by his immediate predecessor, upon a question which was put to him with regard to the issuing of pilotage certificates to aliens, that while they sympathised with those who brought the matter forward, they had no power to act. Let the Board of Trade take power now. I urge this upon the right hon. Gentleman now, because he has introduced a good Bill and has outlined the way in which it is going to deal with a very important question. But the Bill unfortunately leaves outside its scope many other important matters of detail which must inevitably call for treatment before long. Now, therefore, is the time when the right hon. Gentleman should see to it that this Bill shall be no mere makeshift but should, so far as circumstances permit, be made a comprehensive and an effective measure.

Mr. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith Burghs): The House, having heard the speech of the hon. Member for Stockton, will regard that as a happy augury of the prospects of this Bill. Nobody could have spoken with greater weight upon this subject, and the hon. Gentleman will, I am sure, have the support of every one who desires to see legislation on this subject. When he said that he trusted that this question would not be discussed in a Party spirit, or treated as a political measure, I agree that there is a good reason why the Bill should not be regarded in that light. Here we are not only dealing with a great Imperial industry, but with a class who, by their calling and their absence at sea, are precluded to a large extent from taking part in the elections to this House, and who are therefore to a large extent unrepresented. I congratulate the Government on having introduced at so early a stage in the session this important measure for the good of this great industry and for the good of what has been a neglected class of the community for many years past. I should not have intervened at this stage of the Bill had it not been for the attempt that has been made to drag the trail of protection over this measure. I served on the Committee appointed by the late Government and presided over by the late Secretary to the Board of Trade, Mr. Bonar Law, and I remember then that some alarm was expressed that this Bill might have a protective tendency. The Chairman of that Committee was perfectly fair in the attitude he then took up, and he stated that there was never any suspicion of its having any protectionist character. As for the main provisions, I think on the whole they are excellent. I will say a word about these consultative committees which have been proposed. I think those committees are very desirable, but where I think we need some reassurance is that the representation of the officers and men shall be adequate. I think that if that is secured these committees are good in themselves, because the officers and men are so much at sea, and it is so comparatively difficult for them to combine, that the shipowners are not in such constant touch with them as other classes of employers and employed, and I look to these consultative committees, as giving them a common meeting ground, to remedy some of the many grievances of which we complain. I am delighted that so much stress has been laid upon inspection. We all of us regret that there is not a greater proportion of British seamen on board our mercantile marine, and I am sure that one of the best ways to set about the remedy is by having better conditions of food and accommodation. I hope that the inspectorate will have a wide discretion, and will be able to inspect very freely and very largely at its discretion, and that an effective remedy may be introduced. I think the language test is an excellent one. I myself will not go much farther than that, at any rate at present, and I think so far from this being an unimportant Bill it promises to be one of the most valuable of measures to one of the most neglected classes; and when we reflect, whether in regard to compensation for injury or in respect to other circumstances, how this class has been, I might almost say wronged as compared with other sections of the community, I think we might well join to secure for this Bill a full and fair discussion, and give it every chance to pass into law.

*SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): Representing a riverside constituency—a constituency which has observations always on trade and commerce as represented by shipping—I think it not unnatural that I should say a few words in connection with this Bill, so ably introduced by the President of the Board of Trade. I think that the moderation of the speeches which have been delivered is the best evidence that can be given to the President of the Board of Trade, first, of the wisdom of having brought in the Bill, and, secondly, of the wisdom of the provisions so far as they go. For myself I do not think the provisions have gone quite far enough, and I do not wish the President of the Board of Trade to think that is because I am supposed to have protectionist leanings. It is not that, but it is because one cannot travel the world over and observe the conditions under which our seamen work, and in which our shipping moves throughout the Empire, without having brought home very strongly to him certain inequalities, the regulation of which the right hon. Gentleman has embodied in this Bill. The President of the Board of Trade would not think, I believe, that he had protectionist leanings if I said that he was interested in the regulation of inequalities in international trading as represented, for instance, by the embargo placed upon British shipping in the islands of the South Sea. I do not want to enter into that question, but it must show the House that one is necessarily impressed in watching the developments of our shipping by these inequalities in international trading which oppress not only the seamen but the shipping itself. The President of the Board of Trade said that he was very much astonished to see the proportion of foreign seamen in our mercantile marine as against the number of British sailors employed. He regarded it at first as a very serious thing. I still regard it as a very serious thing. The President of the Board of Trade thinks also that possibly these conditions will be ameliorated by foreign countries in developing their own shipping and absorbing the men who now come into our mercantile marine. Very well; but is it not a curious thing that since the very beginning of the development and extension of foreign shipping there has been an increase of foreigners in our own mercantile marine? That is a point which I beg the President of the Board of Trade to consider.

*MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: What I more particularly referred to were the conditions of sailors on board foreign vessels.

*SIR GILBERT PARKER: I may have misunderstood the right hon. Gentleman, but I think the impression of the House was that they were going to absorb in their own ships the seamen who now come to us. I think, on the contrary, that when you once begin to decline in the employment of your own people, unless you take more or less drastic measures, you cannot prevent continued decline. If the tendency is to decline it will continue to decline, and if there is an upward movement, it will continue to be upward unless you have something more than a moral oversight of these conditions. I suggest to the President of the Board of Trade that while I am sure he is sympathetic with me and a great many others who sit on the Opposition side or on the Ministerial side in regard to alien pilots, he ought to put his sympathy into practical exercise. I know the House is quite aware that while we admit alien pilots into our waters to exercise their functions, without any of the real examination which our own pilots undergo—an examination which belongs also to a constant daily experience in our waters—while that is the case, not a single British pilot can have the run of foreign waters. That is an inequality which has nothing whatever to do with protectionist leanings, but has to do with an injustice which I hope the President of the Board of Trade will attempt to remove, in spite of the suggestion that the agitation behind this Alien Pilots Bill may come from the Opposition side of the House. I honestly do not think that the President of the Board of Trade would attribute to sympathy with protective measures in other directions the view we take on this matter, and if he goes on in the course which I judge he has mapped out for himself in this Bill, I think he will find on the Opposition side of the House constant congratulation. I have always felt during the six years I have been in Parliament that the Board of Trade was behind in matters which it ought to have been forward in. The President of the Board of Trade has an opportunity of creating for himself a reputation in that department of public service for which not only his own side of the House will thank him, but also the Opposition and the Labour Members. May I raise another question? I do not know whether Members on the Opposition side will agree with me or not—but take the question of the lascars, and other Asiatics, who are employed in the mercantile marine. It is a very difficult question and involves a constitutional consideration, to say the least, but I think that in the interests of safety the language test ought to be applied to them as to foreign seamen—to this extent, that one man at any rate out of ten lascars should be able to speak the English language. It is evident that I am not pressing this in order to achieve any object except that of having in our mercantile marine the quality of safety. Now the President of the Board of Trade bases all the provisions regarding these regulations as to foreign seamen upon the basis of safety. I really do not think it is the case. I think he has other ends in view. However that may be, he let the matter rest upon the basis of safety. I really cannot see why the same element of safety should not enter into the employment of lascars in our mercantile marine, and I would suggest that the Serangs, who are generally the head of about ten lascars, should be able to speak English.

*MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: He must.

*SIR GILBERT PARKER: Very well; but is that embodied in the law? I press this upon the right hon. Gentleman as a question to consider. It would naturally come up on the Second Reading of the Bill. I congratulate him on his intention of establishing regulations for a load line and for a scale of food. It is not for me to say a word against shipowners or to make any criticism whatever, because I do not know the inside of the business as the right hon. Gentleman does; but I have, for the past five years, been reading on this subject—my constituents compel me to do so—and I find that again and again responsible public men connected with the trade of shipping have stated that much could be done, by improving the scale of food on ships, in inducing not only boys to enter the mercantile marine but to stay and not desert. The right hon. Gentleman said, I think, that 28,000 seamen deserted last year. That is a very serious thing indeed, and I believe that if the seaman's life, which is not an easy one, were made more palatable by better fare, and better accommodation on board, there would be a difference in the returns regarding desertion, and you would not find that continually decreasing number of British seamen. I wish to read an extract from a report upon certain occurrences at Cardiff, to which the right hon. Gentleman referred. Cardiff is, of course, in a peculiar position, as we all know. Cardiff is different from almost every port in the kingdom; there you have a centre of disaffection among seamen for many reasons. You have the question of employment of "Greeks, infidels, and heretics" and people of all nationalities, who are employed at £1 per month less than British seamen receive. If you have one part of the United Kingdom where that kind of thing is going on, you have just as dangerous a thing surrounding wages and employment and the standard of life of the seamen as you would have if you introduced into Stepney 8,000 or 10,000 aliens. It is exactly the same thing. Bring foreigners into Stepney to lower the standard of wages and the whole condition of labour, and you have exactly the same thing as occurs in Cardiff which is described in the following newspaper quotation—

> "It is not uncommon outside Cardiff shipping offices to see scores of British seamen standing aside with discharge books, while the books of Spaniards, Portuguese, Greeks, Italians and Russians have been taken possession of by the chief officers of ships. In a walk along the Bute Road—the main thoroughfare to the docks—one meets and hears as many foreigners as Britishers."

I think I see in this proposed Bill something which is going to have a considerable effect upon such conditions, because if it establishes the principle that every foreigner upon a British ship must understand the rudiments of the English language, then I think that when that British ship goes abroad to a foreign port, it will not dismiss its British seamen to the same extent as is being done now, if that ship when it returns to a British port must employ a foreigner who can speak the British language. Therefore, I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon one means of checking alien immigration which I think will be most effective, and it has no taint whatever of those principles which I and my friends profess. It is retaliatory but not protective. It only establishes the conditions that there shall not be gross inequalities of service between the foreigner and the British citizen. I shall have great hopes of the Party opposite if the President of the Board of Trade is only permitted to lead them in their policy, which will satisfy me as well the Labour Members sitting on this side of the House, who are as keen about these things which are not called by such names as terminological inexactitudes, but which deal with conditions in which foreigners work at an advantage over the British workman, whether in shipping or any other form of labour in the national life. I wish to quote one thing more, and it has reference to the question of wages. We have dealt most largely in the House this afternoon with sailors in our home ports, and in what may be called home trade. I wonder if it is realised how extensive is the employment of foreign sailors on British ships in distant parts of the world. The figures, I am sure, have astounded the President of the Board of Trade, and they have astounded me. Of petty officers the percentage of foreigners is between 60 to 78 per cent. of those employed, able seamen 77 per cent., and firemen 86 per cent. Those figures relate to sailors employed on British ships trading to the Ear East and elsewhere.

*MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Does that include lascars?

*SIR GILBERT PARKER: No, it does not include lascars. If these figures are not correct, they are worth consideration. This report goes on to say—

> "I have exact particulars of a small vessel trading to the East which has tried all three crews for the same voyage. The monthly wages were:—British (18), £81; Dutch (18), £68 5s.; Lascars (37), £60 13s. There was a further difference in the cost of food of 5s. 9d. a day in favour of the lascars against the other two, which both cost the same for this item. The proportion in cost works out thus:—Lascars 100, Dutch 118, British 131."

It must be clear to this House that if you have those cutting conditions in the trade of shipping or anything else, our own seamen must suffer. It has been said in the House that the fact is that there is no competition, and that our working classes do not care to be seamen. It is said that other trades are more attractive, and that even if you were to give them more encouragement they would not accept service as seamen. I may say that there is scarcely a week passes without an appeal reaching me from my constituency from some home or foreign-going pilot, or some waterside man who says that he cannot get his son into a British ship. I know two instances of boys of nineteen years of age who are able-bodied fellows, who came up to the London docks and applied to the British ships there, and could not get on; and why? Because of the foreigners. At last one of them got a berth on an American ship, but the other returned to Gravesend and he is still seeking employment. That young fellow wants to go to sea. I am aware that British shipping companies have done a vast deal to encourage boys to enter the mercantile marine. I think the right hon. Gentleman suggested that Sir Alfred Jones had tried to experiment first under Mr. Ritchie's scheme which was effective although not so effective as it ought to be. Other firms have records which I could enumerate and develop, but I forbear on this the first reading of this Bill. Earnest efforts are being made by British shipping companies to induce boys to go into the mercantile marine. A remarkable letter was written by Lord Inverclyde which offered a very excellent suggestion, to which I will draw the attention of the President of the Board of Trade. Lord Inverclyde says—

> "I believe British shipowners are most desirous of employing dependable British sailors, and from my own experience those sailors who have had a training in the reserve of the Royal Navy are most desirable men to have in merchant vessels, and if the Admiralty will do more to encourage boy sailors in the Naval Reserve, there will be more British sailors in the mercantile marine."

If there were more co-operation between the Board of Trade and the Admiralty in this direction, I think a great deal might be done. The danger is not alone an industrial danger. It is serious enough industrially, but it is also a national danger. It effects our very security and our position as a great mercantile nation; and not only this, but it affects us also as a great Imperial Power with vast interests in every part of the world to protect. Continually, as we are opening up new avenues for our trade in neutral markets, since we are shut out of other markets to a considerable extent, there devolves upon us the responsibility of encouraging by some wise scheme the employment of boys as apprentices. I know the old system of apprentices cannot be re-introduced, but I suggest that these figures are extremely suggestive and very significant. In the year 1845 the number of apprentices in our mercantile marine was 15,704, but in the year 1903 the number was only 1,072. I do not know whether the hon. Members who represent the interests of labour more directly than I do can see a way out of that difficulty, but I do suggest that the President of the Board of Trade, in further developing this Bill, as I hope he will do, will see if there is any way by which he can create a new interest for boys in our mercantile navy and give them a new encouragement. I am certain that if the right hon. Gentleman develops this Bill on the lines upon which it has been introduced, and if it passes with all those suggested clauses which the right hon. Gentleman has presented this afternoon, the course of the employment of foreign seamen in our waters and in our ships will be arrested, and we shall have started upon a new course in the defence, shall I say, of the interests of our shipping, of the interests of industry, and of the interests of labour. Because I feel that this Bill is a step in the right direction, I most cordially support the measure which the right hon. Gentleman has brought in; and when he has passed it, the President of the Board of Trade will have produced for this country legislation which is for its good, for the good of trade and commerce, and in the interests of national safety.

*MR. SUMMERBELL (Sunderland): I should like to say a word or two with regard to this Bill. It seems to me that not sufficient attention has been paid to the mercantile marine in times gone by; this Bill is wanted very badly so far as the mercantile marine is concerned. It has occupied a very prominent part in the recent election, so far as the north-east coast is concerned, on account of there being no load line on foreign vessels trading in the ports on that coast, in competition with British shipowners, and the difference between the load which they are able to take has proved sufficient to enable the foreign shipowners in many cases to take the trade away from British firms. I am pleased, so far as this particular phase of the question is concerned, that in future both are going to be treated alike. I do not agree that we have not sufficient men in our own country to man the mercantile marine; on the contrary, I am convinced that we have sufficient Britishers, but when you review the whole of the circumstances appertaining to the mercantile marine, you will find that the conditions are not sufficiently tempting to induce boys to go to sea. If this Bill is carried out in a proper spirit, and all those reforms which have been mentioned are given effect to, the mercantile marine will be made more attractive, and we shall find that there are plenty of English lads ready to go to sea to serve their time as in days gone by. Certainly, so far as our sea-ports are concerned, the number of lascars and other foreign seamen employed have not at all admitted of English seamen going to sea. It is all very well to talk of the lascar being a Britisher, but whether in that category or not he should be made to comply with the same regulations as the British seaman. The right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill dealt with the case of foreign crews. I think that would be a danger in case of war, and it is not creditable to us as a nation that we should have so many foreign seamen on board our ships as we have at the present time. I think we ought to view the matter very seriously from that standpoint. I am convinced that if we were at war with any strong nation we would find it was an extreme danger. We ought to give more attention to it than the right hon. Gentleman seems disposed to do. In regard to the question of handing seamen over to municipalities for training, I think that should not be altogether considered a municipal question. In this country, however, some authority, I contend, should see to the fulfilment of the conditions laid down. I think there are many ways in which we might encourage lads to go to sea, and I would like, so far as the municipalities are concerned, that encouragement should be given to them to provide the necessary material. I am pleased that the question of a food scale has been dealt with; I think that has been a standing disgrace in regard to many of our ships for many years. I do not see why we cannot have a food scale for the mercantile marine. We have a food scale in connection with the Navy and the Army. There is one matter which was touched upon by the right hon. Gentleman which I do not care much about, and that is the question of advisory committees. It has been a grievance for many years with regard to local marine boards that you have generally on a board one representative of the men and nine or ten shipowners. If we are going to have advisory committees of that character, then so far as I am personally concerned, the proposal will not receive my support If we are to have advisory committees there should be equal representation on them, and on that condition, and that condition only, am I prepared to hand over increased authority to the advisory committees. I am sorry that the question of alien pilots has not been dealt with. I do hope that this question will be dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman. I know that the pilots of the place from which I come feel strongly in regard to this matter; they have not only "deputised" myself on that question, but they have written to me at the House of Commons, and it will be a great disappointment to them if it is not taken up and dealt with in this particular Bill. I am very pleased at the advent of the Bill, and I hope and believe that if it is carried out in a proper and true spirit, it will tend to make the mercantile marine of this country more attractive to our sons, and tend also to the benefit of the nation.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I represent, it is true, an inland city, but it is one which takes the greatest interest in everything pertaining to the welfare of the mercantile marine. When I contested my first constituency, twenty-one years ago, Mr. Samuel Plimsol, to whom the mercantile marine are so greatly indebted, represented the City of Sheffield. That shows that it is a city which has been most deeply interested in seamen and in the shipping of our country, My right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade has received much congratulation from both sides of the House this afternoon, and I hope it will be an encouragement to him in bringing in this measure of justice for British shipping and British seamen. I hope it will encourage him to turn his attention to other matters pertaining to his department, and that he will see that equal justice should be done to our countrymen in all branches of trade and commerce. For myself I have never pretended to care in the least from what Party the reforms I have advocated come. I am ready to accept them from the right hon. Gentleman opposite quite as readily as I should accept them from my own side. The only thing that I aim at is the reforms themselves, and if the right hon. Gentleman will endeavour to carry them out, my gratitude will go out to him quite as much as to his predecessors in office, who happened to be my political friends. It is not a question of fair trade, or protection, or tariff reform, or anything of that sort; it is a question of justice to our countrymen in the shipping trade and to our own sailors. The Bill which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has described this afternoon in many particulars, so far as we are able to gather from his able speech, appears to carry out, or endeavours to carry out, that measure of justice to our own people. I think he will admit that from all on this side of the House the matters to which he has referred have received very full consideration. The ship-owners, represented by the hon. Member for Stockton, who speaks with unequalled authority, gladly welcomed the Bill. The seamen themselves have been largely represented, as also the interests affecting the sea ports. The right hon. Gentleman will not have failed to notice one suggestion of a very significant character which came from an hon. Member on his own side. It was to the effect that he ought to take care that the wages paid on foreign ships coming into British ports are on the same scale as the wages paid to British seamen on British vessels. I do not desire a better sentiment to be expressed from any part of the House or from any section of the community than that, and when we find that that feeling was received with so much favour on the benches opposite I hope my right hon. friend will take note of the sentiment and direct his legislative measure in that direction. I join with the hon. Member for Sunderland in expressing regret that nothing has been done as regards Alien pilots. This Bill will be referred to the Grand Committee on Trade, and it will be left, as the right hon. Gentleman has said, to the good judgment of that Committee without any pressure from Government Whips or political Parties. It is quite possible that the right hon. Gentleman may see his way to incorporate or assist in the incorporation of a clause in the Bill which will carry out this measure of justice with respect to the pilotage on our coasts. It is perfectly scandalous that so long a time has been allowed to elapse without any adequate measure being taken in that direction. Not only is there considerable danger indeed in giving such an intimate knowledge of our ports, harbours, and coasts to foreigners, but the competition which they exercise in that very important profession is of a very serious character, and I hope that means will be taken to put an end to it, and to enable our people to compete on fair terms. Many times in the past twenty years I have called attention to the immigration of between 10,000 and 15,000 foreign sailors. The hon. Member for Sunderland spoke of the difficulty of getting boys to enter the Navy and the figures which were given to the House by my hon. friend the Member for Gravesend were of a very significant character indeed. There were 15,000 apprentices in 1854 and only 1,000 in a recent year to which the hon. Member referred. I think the reluctance of boys to enter the mercantile marine is connected very intimately indeed with the enormous immigration of foreign sailors who make it exceedingly difficult for them to obtain a satisfactory livelihood. The hon. Member for Middlesbrough, who speaks on this subject with authority, said that for every berth our British sailor could obtain there were from ten to twelve candidates. That is a very serious statement to have made to the House, and it is important that at last we should have the attention of the Board of Trade directed to this circumstance. I am sure that every support that can be given to the right hon. Gentleman in carrying the Bill which promises to be of such a valuable and useful character will be given by all the hon. Gentlemen who sit upon this side of the House. For myself, if I may venture to do so as representing a constituency deeply interested in the mercantile marine, I express my gratitude for the measure he is proposing to introduce.

*MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I trust that the House will now allow us to get our Bill. I did not introduce the Bill under the ten minutes rule because I recognised that there ought to be an expression of opinion on a matter of such considerable importance to the shipping industry. But I hope it will be recognised now that we have had two or three hours debate that we should be allowed to get the Bill brought in. The reception accorded to the Bill has been exceptionally gratifying. I think I had better not tread on the dangerous ground which the right hon. Gentleman opposite invited me to enter upon; it is rather a quagmire, and I would rather avoid it at the present moment. There are two or three very practical questions which have been raised in the course of the discussion, which I should like to reply to before I sit down. The question of alien pilots was referred to by the hon. Member opposite and by my hon. friends on this side of the House. It is not such a serious matter as hon. Members seem to imagine. I have gone into the matter and I find that there are only eighty-five certificates issued to foreigners. Now that cannot be a very serious detriment to our pilots in this country. Still, I agree on the whole that they ought to be granted. My impression is that none of the Presidents of the Board of Trade have come quite up to the high standard of the hon. and gallant Member for Sheffield. This practice is quite recent, and I do not think it is one which ought to have been entered upon. I might have incorporated a clause of this kind in the Bill had it not been for the very important constitutional question which arises upon it. I believe that there are foreign countries which give pilot certificates to our shipmasters. At any rate, it is a treaty question. I submitted the matter to the law officers of the Crown, and it had to go to solicitors first. As hon. Members know, these gentlemen do not move very rapidly, and therefore I did not get an opinion from the law officers of the Crown on the point before my Bill was introduced. But if my legal friends tell me that there is no great constitutional or international difficulty in the way, and if any Amendment is moved in that direction to the Bill when in Committee, I shall be happy to accept it.

MR. WYNDHAM: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow that that be an instruction to the Committee?

*MR. LLOYD GEORGE: I should say that that would be a question for Mr. Speaker. In regard to the advisory Committee, I do not understand my hon. friend opposite to deprecate the setting up of such a Committee. There must be a Committee to advise before the regulations which affect a very great industry are framed. The hon. Gentleman must not assume that the Board of Trade would not set up such a Committee without the seamen as well as the shipmasters being adequately represented. I certainly had it in my mind that there be representatives of a class whose lives depend on the working of these regulations. My hon. friend raised the questions of lascars. I do not understand him to go as far as to deprecate the employment of any lascars on British ships. That would be provincialism of the very worst kind. I think that my hon. friend only wishes that there should be a certain proportion of white men to the lascars, and, if I understood him aright, he suggested four in sixty. At the present moment there is one white man in fifteen, which fairly answers to what my hon. friend wants. Then my hon. friend spoke of the lascars being unable to understand English orders; but there is a serang, who gives the orders to the lascars, and I believe that he understands the sort of English language which is used in the East on British ships.

*SIR GILBER TPARKER: The proportion of white men to lascars may be the same as mentioned by the right hon. Gentlemen on P. & O. liners, but there are certain tramp steamers on which the proportion is not so large.

*MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have given a general answer to the hon. Gentleman, but I will look into the matter further. I understand that there is not such a difference as my hon. friend seems to imagine, in regard to the question of wages paid to lascars. I am informed that if a calculation is to be made in regard to the wages paid on board ship, two lascars are equal to one European. I understand that you cannot employ Europeans in the stokehold in the Red Sea.

*Mr. HAVELOCK WILSON: I would point out that more than half the ships trading to the East through the Red Sea have white men employed in the stokeholds.

*Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: That was the information given to me by a shipowner. However, I do not think that there is such a difference with regard to the wages as my hon. friend stated. I sincerely trust that hon. Members will now allow this Bill to be read a first time.

Sir W. EVANS GORDON (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): The right. hon. Gentleman spoke of emigrant ships coming to British ports picking up passengers, but he did not make any mention of foreign immigrant ships which bring an enormous percentage of foreigners to this country, nor did he make any reference to the disgraceful condition in which these people come to this country.

*Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: That matter will be dealt with in the Bill.

Mr. C. D. SCHWANN (Cheshire, Hyde): There is, I am informed, as much danger of ships being underballasted as being overloaded, and I hope something will be done to fix a light load line. I am told that in an ordinary sea the screw is well under water in a lightly ballasted ship and that the vessel is well under control, but that in rough weather the screw pitches out of the water, and it then becomes exceedingly difficult to direct the course of the ship. A large proportion of the dangers and harm to vessels in ballast occurs when they are not sufficiently ballasted. I do not want the right hon. Gentleman to overload his Bill, but I wish to draw his attention to this matter, which is worthy of serious consideration.

Mr. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD (Liverpool, West Derby): I wish to ask a question in reference to the status of officers on board British ships. Is it the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to do anything to secure that these officers shall be British subjects? As I understood the President of the Board of Trade, he only referred to the members of the crew. Then as to the Consultative Committee. There are two associations — the Merchants' Service Guild and the Mercantile Marine Association. Does the right hon. Gentleman propose that either of these associations should have some representative on the Advisory Committee?

*Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: In regard to foreign officers on board British ships, they must get a British certificate. As to the second point, I hope the hon. Gentleman will not invite me to enter on the very thorny subject as to which of the associations I shall make a selection of representatives on the Advisory Committees from. I will not commit myself on the point at the present moment. On the question of a light load line my hon. friend knows that it is a very difficult point, and that a Bill was introduced in the House of Lords on this subject and was dropped. However, I will consider it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Ordered, That leave be given to bring in a Bill to amend the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894 to 1901, and that Mr. Lloyd-George, Mr. Solicitor-General, Mr. Kearley, and Mr. Runciman do prepare and bring it in.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

"To amend the Merchant Shipping Acts, 1894 to 1901," presented accordingly, and read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 114.]

SUPPLY [19th March] REPORT.

ARMY ESTIMATES, 1906-7.

"That a sum, not exceeding £10,220,000, be granted to His Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Pay, etc., of His Majesty's Army (including Army Reserve) at Home and Abroad (exclusive of India), which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1907."

Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

*COLONEL LEGGE (St. George's, Hanover Square) said he would like to say with what pleasure as an old soldier he had listened to the sympathetic speech with which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War had introduced the Army Estimates and the appreciation the right hon. Gentleman had expressed of the services of the officers of the Army. They had heard very frequently in that House depreciation of Army officers, and that depreciation had been very painful to brave, honourable and sensitive men who, having devoted themselves to the defence of their country, were unable to defend themselves in this House. He was also pleased to hear the appeal which the right hon. Gentleman made that the consideration of Army questions should be approached from a non-Party point of view. That appeal had been made by himself from the benches opposite and he regretted to say that it did not meet with the response which he thought it deserved, but he could assure the right hon. Gentleman and those who represented the War Office in the House that, as far as he was concerned, and he believed those sitting near him were quite agreed with him upon that point, they should on this question of Army administration, Army reform and Army organisation, show a non-Party spirit, though, of course, they reserved to themselves the right to criticise any proposals which might be brought forward. He was also pleased to hear the right hon. Gentleman say that he proposed to take the advice of the expert officers with whom he was now associated at the War Office rather than the advice of the experts of youth and inexperience sitting below the gangway on the Ministerial side of the House. With regard to the land forces that we had to keep up, he was one of those who did not desire that we should have in the Army a single soldier more than was necessary, but he did not believe that by simply reducing the numbers we should necessarily increase the efficiency of the Army. As had been pointed out by many speakers, the strength of our Army depended upon our Indian and Colonial garrisons, and he must say that he looked forward to the time when the Colonial garrisons might be substantially reduced, if they were not taken away altogether. That time might be near or it might be distant, but he believed that in that direction we might eventually get some reduction of our land forces. With regard to India, however, he did not think anything of that kind was possible. The number of white troops which we kept in India at the present time was only 78,000, and although some Members had referred to the state of Russia at the present time and had drawn from that the idea that we might reduce our garrison in India, he did not believe for a moment that that was possible. Russia had no doubt suffered severely during the late war, but he believed that she had throughout it a very large force indeed upon the frontiers of Afghanistan. She was now withdrawing her Army from Manchuria, and there was no reason why that Army, or a very large portion of it, should not reinforce the troops which Russia already had on the North West frontier of India. They heard very often that the invasion of India through Afghanistan by Russia was a difficult operation, not in the least likely to be carried out. While, however, it was a difficult operation, the obstacles were not insuperable, and British forces had more than once traversed the territory; they had overcome all the difficulties of transport and supply by military foresight and arrangements. Then it was said that Afghanistan was hostile to Russia, but when the British force from India reached Cabul in 1879 they found in the Afghan Treasury a large number of Russian gold coins. He had one of them with him. These Russian gold coins were sent there for a certain purpose. It was to pave the way and make Afghanistan the approach to India. There was no reason to suppose that what had been done once should not be done again. Under these circumstances he failed to see where the argument advanced by hon. Members came in. These gold coins were captured by the British, and at the time money not being very plentiful in the British Treasury chest, they were issued to the British troops for their pay; that was to say, the British troops were paid with Russian gold. He thought that was the only pay he had ever saved. The right hon. Gentleman began his speech in introducing these Estimates by stating that our Reserves filled up the battalions for service. That was perfectly true, and our Reserves were in no proper sense of the word Reserves at all. They often heard it said that Mr. Cardwell's scheme gave short service and a Reserve, but that was only part of the truth. It really did neither. It did not give us short service in the way in which it was understood on the Continent, viz., service for two or three years with the Colours and a longer period with the Reserve. For the simple reason that we had to keep up the Army in India we could not reduce our term of service in the way that continental armies could. We therefore depended upon an intermediate service between the short and the long service. But even that was not entirely successful, for in 1889, when we had to mobilise our Army, the Estimates provided for a force at home of Regular troops of 125,000, and for a Reserve of 90,000. The Reserves were, however, practically only 78,000, and when it became necessary to mobilise our Army in South Africa we had to leave at home no fewer than 92,000 men who were unfit for war service. The result was that after deducting these 92,000 men and calling up the Reserve of 78,000, the Army after mobilisation was 14,000 weaker than before. That was a very unsatisfactory state of things, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would endeavour by some means or another to see if he could not get a real reserve for the Army. At present, as he had said, it was no true Reserve. So long as that system went on we should find ourselves in the same difficulty, the numbers of our Reserves must be limited by the number of our battalions and the strength of those battalions. The pay of the British officer was very much the same now as it was in the reign of Queen Anne, and if the right hon. Gentleman wished, as no doubt he did, to get officers for the Army it was necessary that they should get better pay, more especially those who joined the more expensive branches of the service such as the cavalry. Whenever this question was put before the right hon. Gentleman representing the War Office in this House, it always received the same answer, namely that, though it was very desirable, there was no money to meet the extra expense. The time had, however, arrived when the officers of the Army should not have to depend upon any private fortune they might possess. The time had come when the country should be called upon to pay the officers of the Army a living wage. Officers of the Army should not be subjected to the stress and strain to which they were now subjected by having to pay so much out of their own private means. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider this matter in the scheme he proposed to bring in next year.

*MR. LUPTON (Lincolnshire, Sleaford) said he was one of that numerous body of Members who sat upon the Liberal side of the House which had denounced the late Government for its extravagance. He was fully aware of the difficulties which had to be faced when making reductions, and he did not blame the right hon. Gentleman for taking plenty of time to consider the way in which this reduction should be made. If the right hon. Gentleman found the difficulties very great, he (Mr. Lupton) would suggest that it would be a good thing to strengthen his hands by the appointment of a Committee who would permanently take in charge the War Office Estimates—men who would not be salaried officers of the Crown and who would have to consider, not the feelings of the Department, but the ordinary taxpayer. It was not for the spending department to fix the amount of the expenditure, but those who had to find the money. The Army would never be a popular service and the Army would never have an efficient staff of officers under a system by which the officers were drawn from one class and the rank and file from another. If the authorities wanted the Army to be made popular in these democratic days they must make the ranks the only way through which a commission could be obtained. If that were done young men of every class of society would enlist. He himself had a friend who, not having much money, went into the Army and worked his way up with great credit to himself, but he finally had to leave the Army because he could not win commission rank. He was a gentleman by birth and education, and he had to leave the Army because it had no career for him. If the alteration he suggested were made, it would be found that the class of men who became officers would be like those who were at the heads of great civil establishments, who had worked themselves up and acquired great scientific attainments. The men who went into the Army would be drawn from all classes, the emoluments offered being quite sufficient. The pay of a lieutenant or captain was not much to a rich man, but it was to a poor man, who would have an incentive to work hard to qualify for higher appointments, and the result would be that there would be in the Army a body of officers possessing considerable scientific knowledge. If this alteration were made it could not be said, as it was said during the Boer War, when the enemy told off sharpshooters to pick off our officers, that it was a mistake on their part, as it left the intelligent non-commissioned officers and men free to manage the Army in a proper way. A friend of his who went through the greater part of that war, with a force of cavalry, had told him that a young officer, who was sent out from England to take command, ordered them to dismount and take the bridles out of the horses' mouths, though everybody except the officer knew that there was a Boer gun 1,500 yards away. It was not until five men had been knocked over by the Boer fire that they got word to disperse, and that order was given by the sergeant. If the men who had charge of our Army had gone through the ranks, things of that sort would not have happened, nor should we have had a general officer ordering our forces to a river, as at Colenso, which river could not be forded, and, as there were no boats, those who could not run away were shot down. We could never have an efficient Army until a vital alteration was made in the manner in which the officers were chosen. It was possible to effect economies in the Army without reducing but adding to efficiency. There were four general officers commanding-in-chief, whose total salaries were over £12,000 a year. Why should we pay a general officer £3,000 a year? It was not as if they were obtained by advertisement. If we wanted to obtain the services of a soldier of fortune from any part of the world to lead our Army, it might be worth while to pay him £3,000, or £30,000 or even £300,000 a year. But the men now in charge entered the Army when they were almost boys, and they did not know whether they were going to be field-marshals or not, and a sufficient pay for that position was £1,000 a year. It was unnecessary to give these large salaries. In civil life inspectors of mines, who had to do a tremendous amount of hard work and undergo great dangers, rose to £800 a year; a few getting £1,000 a year. For that money the best talented men of science could be obtained. Not only could an enormous amount of economy be made in officers' salaries, but also in the number of the higher officers. There were seventy-seven generals, all tumbling over each other's heels, and all enjoying large salaries. He doubted whether many of them would be much good in the case of an invasion by Germany or France, or even to conduct a war in some distant country. Again, there were £4,500,000 spent in pensions. It was quite right that an old soldier should have a pension, but it was not necessary to give such large ones as some of the officers received, the average for officers being something like £300 a year.

*Mr. SPEAKER: Pensions are not borne upon this Vote, and the hon. Gentleman therefore, is not entitled to discuss that question.

*Mr. LUPTON said that the total number of men of all ranks in the service of the King was 1,300,000; but he doubted whether we could put at short notice 100,000 men into a foreign country. If that were the case, as he believed it was, it did not say much for the efficiency with which the Army had been maintained in the past. When the Army was 50,000 men less than it was now, it was almost impossible to put 100,000 men in South Africa without a lot of fuss in this country, and a great many men had to be enlisted, and Militia and Volunteers sent out. That showed that the Army system was thoroughly bad and inefficient, and therefore it was not a question of merely how to reduce the cost of the Army, but also how to make the forces efficient. If the carrying out of what he considered was necessary economy would produce inefficiency he would not advocate it. A few years ago we had a discussion upon Venezuela. The President of the United States took up the side of Venezuela, and he sent a telegram stating that it would be worse for us if we did not submit to arbitration. How was it that what this country refused to Venezuela we yielded to the President of the United States? Because we knew that the United States was impregnable; the country was so vast and the men so warlike that for this country to have attacked the United States would have been folly. They might have bombarded our sea coast towns.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is not confining himself to the Vote before the House, and I must ask him to be more relevant.

*MR. LUPTON said that he considered that the troops in many of the garrisons abroad were a source of weakness rather than of strength, because they might require more troops sent out to them in order to defend them. He excluded those at Gibraltar, Malta, and Hong Kong, but with those exceptions the troops we had abroad which were not required for policing purposes were sources of weakness. He thought it would be agreed that the number of troops maintained in India was relevant to this discussion. It had always been said that the construction of railways in India would reduce the number of troops required for the defence of that country. The troops in India could now be more easily concentrated on one spot where they happened to be needed, and an Army half the size would be considered more efficient with the aid of the better railway facilities than one double the size at a time when there were no railways. On those grounds he suggested that the Indian Army should be reduced by one half, and that the supports of the Indian Army in this country should also be reduced by one half. With regard to armaments, our troops are now armed with the magazine rifle.

*MR. SPEAKER: That subject arises on another Vote. I must warn the hon. Gentleman that I have already twice called him to order for irrelevancy.

*MR. LUPTON urged that in India the north-west frontier was not the greatest source of danger, because the danger was more likely to be on the Japan side. A large extension of the land forces at home was necessary for the security of the country. He thought that could best be done by increasing the Volunteers. They might be doubled in numbers.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order. That question arises on a different Vote. I have now called the hon. Member to order three times for irrelevancy, and I must therefore ask him to discontinue his speech.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.) said the Secretary for War yesterday disclaimed any responsibility on the part of the War Office for the introduction into Waterford of a South African horse disease through Army horses. The disease had been introduced owing to the want of proper precautions on the part of the Army Veterinary Department. He might say that the matter was at one time thought to be so serious that it was a question whether or not the arrangements for the great national horse show should be suspended. He had listened with surprise to the reply given by the right hon. Gentleman to the speeches made upon this question. He could furnish the right hon. Gentleman with many statistics showing that the disease had been introduced through the medium of Army horses, and this had been admitted by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Dublin. There was no doubt about this disease having been introduced by Army horses, and he could confirm it by evidence from his own constituency, because there never was a case of South African distemper in Waterford until the Army horses were brought back from South Africa. He did not know how the right hon. Gentleman could say that the War Office was not responsible in any respect. He could quote speeches in which the Secretary of State and the War Office were informed, before the horses were ever sent home, of the existence of the disease in South Africa and of the dangers which might result from their being brought to this country. Would it be believed that the veterinary authorities were cognisant of this state of things and that they allowed a number of horses stationed at Waterford to be sent out to grass in the country districts? In the end these horses were slaughtered. The War Office had peddled and trifled with the outbreak while the horses were in the barracks. It was on account of the horses having been sent out to grass that the disease had been spread. The county council had done their duty most admirably, and by their action the disease had been largely, if not altogether, stamped out. The indirect effect of the outbreak in the dislocation of trade and the stoppage of fairs and markets had been enormous in his constituency There was not a single case of disease in the city or county of Waterford among so-called civilian horses until 7th February, 1905, and fifteen months before that there were the cases he had referred to in the barracks. There never was a clearer case in which the locality had no part in the origin of the disease. It was bad enough that the people of Ireland should be obliged to pay for a war with which they had no sympathy, but it was doubly hard that as a legacy of the war this disease should have been brought to the country. When he made a claim some time ago for compensation from the War Office, on behalf of the local authority, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South Dublin admitted that there were special circumstances in the case, and though he would not give a direct promise, he said he was quite prepared to recognise that there were special considerations to be taken into account. The disease had been propagated by the horses of officers who went out to hunt. He thought a reply of another nature might have been expected from the Secretary of State for War yesterday.

Mr. O'SHEE (Waterford, W.) said the reply given yesterday by the right hon. Gentleman was the exact antithesis of the attitude taken by the late Government on the subject. Members of the late Government admitted that there was a case, though they contended that they had no power to give compensation out of Army funds for the loss sustained by local authorities. The right hon. Gentleman had alleged that he could claim from the locality for the loss of military horses by this disease. The facts easily disposed of that contention. He was rather surprised at what he could only call the audacity of the Army Veterinary Department in putting such an answer into the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman. The first case occurred on 5th October, 1903, and the horse was shot. Five horses were shot and cremated eight days later. During the whole of 1904 horses were from time to time shot and cremated in the military barracks of Waterford. These cases occurred before there was a single case outside the barracks, and during that time officers whose horses were quartered in the military barracks were hunting throughout the district. In June, 1904, a number of horses were sent out to grass, and on 29th July one of them was shot. Three horses were shot in January, 1905, because they had been in contact with animals which were affected. These horses which were the private property of officers were sent out to the country, the officers thinking that in this way they would be able to save them from being slaughtered. His contention was that the Army Veterinary Department did not take such strong measures as they ought to have done to stamp out the disease. When there were animals in the barracks suffering from disease the officers' horses were allowed to go out three or four times a week to hunt all over the country. There were eight cases in 1905 in civilian stables, and seven of these places were stables of hunting men. As the result of the outbreak of disease the county of Waterford had already had to pay £800 as compensation out of the rates. The Waterford Agricultural Society lost £345 in the expenses they had incurred when they were prevented from holding their annual show. The horses in the county of Waterford were prevented from attending the great horse show in Dublin and other local shows, and the result was that those local shows had to be dropped after all the preparations had been made for them. The direct loss had amounted to £1,500, but the indirect loss to horse breeders and horse dealers could only be estimated at many thousands of pounds.

Mr. O'MARA (Kilkenny, S.) said that his constituency adjoined Waterford and there was an outbreak of this disease there traceable to the same cause—the introduction of the plague from South Africa by the military horses. Whole districts of his county had been put to enormous expense and trouble to stamp out the disease; while for three years in succession the shows in county Kilkenny could not be held. The local rates had suffered to the extent of £1,000, while the people had likewise suffered from not being allowed to move their horses from place to place. The War Office owed more than an explanation to the county councils; they owed compensation for the expenses they had incurred; and still heavier compensation to private individuals whose losses could be traced to the introduction of the disease by the military horses.

MR. HALDANE said he could assure the hon. Gentleman who had introduced this subject into the debate that the most strict instructions had been given to the Veterinary Department of the War Office, and their Report was that there had been no disease among military horses in Waterford since October, 1904, and he thought for some time past in other parts of Ireland. Even assuming that the disease had been originally introduced from South Africa—he did not admit it—it had spread among other horses.

MR. O'MARA: Does the right hon. Gentleman think that the outbreak was spontaneous?

MR. HALDANE said that what he maintained was that horses were being constantly moved about, and the investigations of the War Office Veterinary Department went to show that there was no evidence that in the county of Waterford and still more in other places, the disease had been brought home to the military horses. On that footing the War Office was not liable. All he could say was that the utmost care had been taken of the military horses, and that everything had been done to prevent the spread of the disease.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD said he wanted to refer to a point which was inseparably connected with the pay of the regular soldier. If a higher rate of pay was offered, undoubtedly a better class of men might be induced to join the Army. At any rate, such men would be attracted if some more satisfactory outlook was offered the regular soldier when his term of service with the colours had expired. Volunteers earned wages, even when drilling; but the regular soldier was taken into the Army at a time when he had not had an opportunity to become a tradesman; and when his period of service expired he was cast upon the market as a casual labourer. In our large towns such as Liverpool there were thousands of these men. There was no more sad sight in the face of civilisation than to see a poor woman, whose husband had gone out to find work, trying to comfort her children who were crying for bread. This casting of old soldiers on the market had increased the army of casuals, and that had caused more damage to the Army than anything else. He had looked in vain for some promise from the Secretary for War on this subject, and he suggested that when the reorganisation of the Army was taken up in detail, this matter should receive the most earnest consideration. In Germany the health, physique, and trade of every soldier was looked after. Each soldier had an opportunity of going on with his particular trade; but in our Army nothing of the kind was done. He had been present two or three times at dinners given to Army veterans, and the fact that the greater proportion of those veterans had to be brought out of the workhouse to enjoy the dinner was a scandal.

And, it being half-past Seven of the Clock, the debate stood adjourned till this Evening's Sitting.

MIDLAND RAILWAY BILL (BY ORDER).

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

*MR. MORTON (Sutherland) regretted that he would be unable to move the instruction of which he had given private notice, as it was not in order, and therefore he moved the rejection of the Bill, in order to obtain some promise from the supporters of this measure to remedy the grievances which were complained of. His complaint was that while the railway gave sleeping-carriage accommodation to first-class passengers, they refused any such accommodation to their third-class passengers. The third-class passengers at the present time paid all the expenses of working the traffic, while the first-class carriages were always run at a loss. While the company did, as he was told, lose by its first-class sleeping carriages that loss, if any, had to be made up from the profits made out of the third class passengers. This railway came to this House for further favours for the benefit of its shareholders, and he submitted that the Bill could only be accepted upon the company undertaking to give equal facilities to both classes of passengers. Up to the present moment he had not heard that the railway company was willing to offer the third class passengers any facilities whatsoever. Personally he would have been satisfied if they had even said that they would consider the matter; but they did not even go as far as that, and therefore he had nothing to do but to oppose the granting of any more favours to this company until the grievance of the third class passengers was considered and dealt with. He moved that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central) said he rose to second the rejection of the Bill, not in any spirit of hostility to the company, because he was a large shareholder in it, but because he thought greater facilities ought to be given to the travelling public. There had been considerable negotiation between the Midland Railway, the Great Central Railway, and the people of Sheffield, who were very much prejudiced by the way in which the trains were run at present by the three competing lines, or perhaps he ought to say by the three different lines, because they evidently had an arrangement among themselves of which Parliament was not cognisant. He would not weary the House by going into the details of the Bill; he would only say that he had been requested by large numbers of his constituents to take this and every other opportunity to bring this matter before the House. He thought that a commercial community of 450,000 was entitled to better treatment than Sheffield was receiving from this company at the present time, and upon that ground, and generally for the purpose of getting some assurance that greater facilities would be given to them, he seconded the rejection of the Bill.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day six months.'"—(Mr. Morton.)

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping) said he had been asked by the Midland Railway Company to state their case as shortly as possible to the House, and to ask its attention to the Bill now before them. He would first say that he had been informed by the Midland Company that the questions his hon. and gallant friend the Member for the Central Division of Sheffield was so anxious to raise were now engaging their earnest attention. With regard to the complaint of the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire he would say at once that the hon. Gentleman was right in voicing the complaints of the third class passengers, and he might be sure that, so far as in them lay, the railway company would do their best for that class of the travelling public. With regard to the Bill itself it conferrred no new powers on the company. It asked for powers to carry out works which were for the benefit alike of the travelling public and of the railway company; it did not ask for any great powers or the devolution of any great powers, nor did it ask for the application of any new principle. He submitted that the Second Reading of an omnibus Bill of this description was not the proper time to raise such questions as those raised by the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire. He thought, moreover, that of all the companies attacked for not giving facilities to the third class passengers, the Midland Railway Company was exceedingly free from the charge of neglecting that section of the travelling public. In fact, the Midland Railway Company was the first to consider them; they had been the pioneers in the matter of improving the condition of the third class passengers. They were the first company to run third class coaches on all their trains and to abolish the second class. He had been particularly asked to state that the policy of giving greater comfort to the third class passengers would continue to be their policy. The fact that such benefits had been given by them to the third class without any instructions from this House should, they thought, entitle them to some consideration at the hands of the House. They also thought that the question raised by the hon. Member for Sutherlandshire was a question of internal management, and if pressed would only lead to a suggestion that the company were incapable of managing their own affairs, which was an insult to the shareholders. He asked the House to support the Second Reading and to send this Bill to a Committee.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy Burghs) said the chief complaint of the hon. and gallant Member opposite was that this was not the best opportunity for the consideration of the questions raised by his hon. friend the Member for Sutherlandshire. But the House must remember that they were face to face with a situation which would preclude their having any opportunity other than the present of drawing attention to the great railway monopolies of this country and their duty to the travelling public. He thought that the complaint of his hon. friend was a just and proper one, and that before the Bill was allowed to be read a second time the House should have some assurance from the railway company that they intended to deal with these matters. That was not asking too much of the company, and if some assurance was not given then he would follow his hon friend into the division lobby. He hoped that they would not have from the Government a strong Party rallying call with regard to this matter, but that the Government would leave this matter an open question so far as their supporters were concerned. He supported the Motion for the rejection of the Bill.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT said he accepted the assurance of his hon. and gallant friend and would withdraw his present opposition to the Bill. But if that assurance was not carried out he warned the railway company that he should oppose the Bill at its subsequent stages.

MR. MYER (Lambeth, N.) desired to call attention to the fact that the railway companies had combined to defy the Board of Trade regulations in certain particulars. He thought that the President of the Board of Trade ought to look very closely into this question in order to find out definitely whether certain kinds of goods should or should not come under the Board of Trade regulations. About eight months ago the companies combined together and decided not to take a certain class of goods except at owner's risk. They met together in conference and resolved to refuse to take such goods as furniture and the like at the company's risk, under the Board of Trade regulations. In his opinion that was a matter which should be gone into very closely, because there were many manufacturers in London and elsewhere who were not able to fight this question for themselves, and therefore the Board of Trade should see that the railway companies were not allowed to continually defy these regulations.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. EMMOTT, Oldham) said the House would possibly desire to hear a word from him before this matter was decided. He recognised the importance of the objections against the Bill raised on both sides of the House, and he thought that at the proper time they would be discussed and dealt with. The House ought to remember that in these cases there was always a community of interests between the railway companies and the public, and they ought not to forget that when coming to their decision. He asked the House to take the view that the Bill ought to go to a Committee and ought not to be rejected on Second Reading. The grounds of objection taken to the Bill were well worthy of consideration at the right time. He thought he should point out with regard to the question of third class sleeping accommodation that that question had better be discussed on another occasion. It was really a matter which, if any change was desirable, called for a change of the general law rather than for amendment by a private Bill of this character. The real question they had to consider on the present occasion was whether this Bill ought to go upstairs to be considered by a properly constituted committee, who would go into the question of whether the concessions asked for by the Midland Railway were of a reasonable character. One of the best features about this House was the way in which Private Bill Committees upstairs did their work. They considered with great care and great patience objections which were brought before them, and he thought in most cases they came to wise decisions. The Midland Railway Company asked for certain facilities from Parliament, and the question they had to consider on the Second Reading was whether it was right and proper that those facilities should be considered by a Committee upstairs. What the hon. Members who were objecting desired to do was to say that because some other facility was not contained in the Bill the measure should be summarily rejected. He begged the House, which was a new one, not rashly to interfere with an omnibus railway Bill dealing with comparatively local and small matters. The objections which had been raised, however just the contentions of hon. Members in regard to them might be, were not of a nature to warrant the rejection of the Bill on the Second Reading, or to justify the House in refusing a fair hearing before a Committee upstairs. All that was asked, no doubt perfectly legitimately, could hardly be properly put into the Bill. If the Bill were rejected on the Second Reading, and the facilities which were asked for and which were probably of some importance to the public were summarily refused, it would interfere with trade and also with employment. Therefore, so far as he was concerned, he should certainly vote for the Second Reading, and he asked the House to do the same.

Sir EDWARD CARSON (Dublin University) said he could not admit that the principles which the Chairman of Committees had just laid down were the principles which always governed the action of the House, because it was decided the other day on the occasion of the Rathmines Sewage Bill—on which the hon. Member did not give the new House, as he called it, any advice whatever—that the only question which the House should consider was whether a particular district was Protestant or Catholic. There was no word that night as to whether this railway ran through a Protestant or a Catholic district. There ought not to be a different principle in relation to the different quarters of the United Kingdom from which these Bills came, and so far as he was concerned, accepting as he did fully the decision which the House came to, viz., that a district in Ireland must not be drained because it was a Protestant district, he should certainly vote against any private Bill which came before the House, unless he had at first ascertained whether he was voting in relation to that Bill on Protestant or Catholic grounds.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir William Bull and Mr. T. L. Corbett.

Bill read a second time and committed.

GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY BILL
(BY ORDER).

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

*MR. MORTON moved that the Bill be read a second time this day six months. He was not at all disheartened by the vote just taken on the Midland Railway Bill. He remembered when he proposed in 1893 to insert a Clause in a Tramway Bill to prevent extra fares being charged on Sundays and public holidays, he was opposed by the Liberal Government of that day, but in the end he defeated them and now that clause was a "Model Clause" and in every Tramway Act all over the United Kingdom, and he had no doubt that the forty-three good and true representatives who voted against the previous Bill would win in the end. [Cries of "Divide" from NATIONALIST Members.] He should like to remind hon. Members from Ireland that he and others had supported them on many occasions in the dark days, some years back. They would gain no time by trying to shout him down. He did not at all agree with the doctrine laid down to-night by the Chairman of Committees. The Chairman knew distinctly that the matter he (Mr. Morton) had brought forward could not be considered upstairs under the present circumstances, and therefore he must do his best to get this Bill thrown out. He remembered that in 1882 when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham was President of the Board of Trade he told the people of this country distinctly that it was not only their right but their duty on occasions when railway and other companies came to Parliament to ask that grievances should be redressed by the companies before any other favours were granted to them by Parliament. He was sorry the Government were against him to-night; but he warned them that in the interests of the people they would defeat the Government yet on this matter. There would be further opportunities on the consideration and Third Reading stages of these Bills to get redress for the grievances properly complained of by the people and he should avail himself of all those opportunities.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT seconded. He did not know whether the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Epping Division of Essex, who appeared to be a universal railway director, was able to give the same assurance for the benefit of his constituents as he did in the case of the Midland Railway Bill, but if not he should have to support the Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day six months.'"—(Mr. Morton.)

MR. DALZIEL said it was most unfortunate that on an important Bill of this character no one was commissioned by the railway company to offer a word of explanation or to reply to any question which might be reasonably asked by any Member of the House. He believed there were directors of the company in the House, and it was their duty to say something. He did not believe that the division on the previous Bill was any indication of what the opinion of this House would be upon the question of whether or not proper accommodation should be provided for third class passengers. They were not asking for anything they were not willing to pay for. They would pay their 5s. or 7s. 6d., and it would recompense the railway companies to meet them in this respect. The railway companies were making a mistake in turning a deaf ear to the reasonable demands that were made. He regretted that so many hon. Gentlemen had found it their duty to oppose the present demand, which represented the opinion of the great mass of working people. In view of the fact that apparently no one was present to give any assurance on behalf of the railway companies, and in view of the fact that there were other matters to be considered to-night, he begged leave to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Dalziel.)

TRINITY COLLEGE, DUBLIN.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.): The Resolution I have the honour to submit for the consideration of the House, reads as follows—"That in the opinion of this House, the revenues of Trinity College, Dublin, are not used to the best advantage for the promotion of the higher education of the Irish people, and that, in view of the deplorable condition of higher education in Ireland, it is of vital and urgent importance that the control and administration of these large revenues should be so achieved as to make them available for the use of the general body of the nation."

I am not going to be tempted to enter upon anything like a critical historical survey of Trinity College and the University of Dublin, for the best of all reasons—I am not possessed of that close intimate knowledge of the institution which some of my learned friends can justly lay claim to; it is enough for my purpose to give a cursory glance back and see what it has done in the way of fulfilling its obligations in so far as providing a higher class University education for my fellow-countrymen, and how it is engaged to-day in the pursuit of that great educational mission. As the House is well aware, Trinity College was established in the year 1592, on a charter of incorporation granted by Queen Elizabeth, and I speak the candid truth when I say it was built and endowed on the ruins of and out of the funds derived from the confiscated properties of the Catholics of Ireland. During all those centuries it has been conducted on exclusively Protestant lines—a foreign institution, nurtured and pampered during all those years for the express purpose of degrading and keeping the Catholic people of Ireland in ignorance—whilst its enormous revenues are employed for the purpose of catering and providing a higher class University education for practically all those opposed to the Catholic and Nationalist forces in Ireland. As I have said, three centuries have now passed since it was first called into existence, and, except for some slight change which has taken place in the government of the College within a comparatively recent date, it has never faltered in its original mission, but remained perfectly consistent and even loyal and faithful to the teaching and spirit of its founders, and has even treated the Catholic people of Ireland as outcasts and strangers. Some attempts have been made to concede to Irish Catholics a system satisfactory to the people, but all such attempts have failed, so far, in carrying out the objects in view. In the year 1794 the Irish Parliament made an attempt to settle the question: Up till that period the Irish Catholics were forbidden to attend the colleges giving a higher class education. Since then various other attempts have been made in the same direction by the Government of this country, and all of them have resulted in turning out failures of the worst possible kind. The last attempt, as the House will remember, was the appointment and sending out of a Royal Commission in the year 1901, for the purpose of gathering together all the expert evidence in Ireland on the subject, with a view of evolving a scheme satisfying the requirements of the Catholics of Ireland. A good deal of time and trouble was spent in trying to find a way out of the difficulty; they compiled a number of books of great educational interest, but the fact of excluding Trinity College, the one solitary teaching University in Ireland, from the scope of the inquiry, reduced the value of, if it did not destroy entirely the Report of the Commission. As usual nothing has come out of that Report, and Ireland to-day, as a consequence, is deprived of the opportunities for higher class University education, enjoyed by every other civilised country in the world. At the time the terms of reference to the late Royal Commission were being settled it was made abundantly clear that Trinity College should be included if it was to bear any good result. The Presbyterians protested, for at a meeting of the Education Committee of that body a resolution was passed and sent to the Government. The Committee—

> "Protested in the strongest terms against the suggested exemption of Trinity College, Dublin, from the scope of the inquiry of the Royal Commission, as any inquiry so restricted instead of inspiring public confidence would awaken mistrust, etc."

Some of the other religious bodies also expressed dissent, and it is well known that Trinity College was excluded from the inquiry, because, amongst other reasons, Judge Madden threatened to resign his Commission if there was any inquiry as to Trinity.

The great Archbishop of Tuam, in examining the late Mr. Lecky, stated that Trinity College—

And His Grace said that that was—

> "A real misfortune."

So that the cry was that no inquiry was to be made into Trinity College, and it was clearly on this understanding that the representatives of Trinity supported the claim of the Catholics to have a University of their own, though subsequently they made use of the exclusion of Trinity to do injury to any other finding of the Commission. For Dr. Traill, the Provost (Vol. III. p. 205), said—

> "If a new College is started in Dublin, with reduced fees, etc., it would be impossible for Trinity College, Dublin, to hold their own against such unfair competition. Again, in order to be in a position to defy competition, they would require another £100,000, and an annual grant of £6,000 a year."

And then Dr. Traill went on to say that there was room for another College and University in Dublin. All this goes to show that Trinity College was purposely and designedly excluded from the terms of the Commission. I suggest that it was because they were afraid it would be proved up to the hilt, that since the Fawcett Act was passed in 1873 it would be impossible for the College to prove that the property of the University granted to it by Elizabeth, James I., Charles I. and II. was to be used as private property of the Provost and Senior Fellows, or that the confiscated estates were to be used for Protestant and Episcopal purposes only. In the debates in this House in 1873, the College authorities professed the desire to make the University a national one, and this is borne out by the preamble to Fawcett's Act, which reads—

> "It is expedient that the benefits of Trinity College and the University of Dublin and of the schools in the said University, as places of religion and learning, should be rendered freely accessible to the nation."

It could be shown that Trinity College has been enormously endowed out of public funds, not merely from the funds derived out of the Catholic estates confiscated all over the land, but by special grants from the Irish Parliament. In June 1709, our Parliament granted £5,000 to Trinity—

> "For erecting a public library in the said College."

Again on 31st October, 1751, a further sum of £5,000 was voted—

> "To be expended in and towards rebuilding and adding to said College."

And Taylor's History says—

> "By the sanction of their Majesties King William III., Queen Anne, King George I., II., and III., various sums were voted by Parliament for buildings in College, the whole sum amounting to £75,000, and still later a sum of £20,000 was lent (interest free) by the Government for the same purpose. Again, a sum computed to be about £140,000 was given as compensation for the right of presentation to livings which was taken away from the College in 1869. And it must also be borne in mind that under the Land Act, 1903, a yearly sum of £5,000 a year was guaranteed to Trinity to make good any losses sustained through the operation of the Land Act. The rental of Trinity College Estates, which are scattered over twelve counties, and which comprise about 200,000 acres in the lands of about 10,000 tenants, and which is valued under the Poor Law valuation at about £100,000—is usually referred to as about £36,000 a year, but this is entirely an underestimate. No doubt the College receives £35,423 a year from middlemen, but in addition they draw a large rental of about £7,500 from tenants in occupation, and the Provost's private estate, the rental of which is not ascertainable, but which I am sure I do not exaggerate when I hit upon the valuation, which is £2,640, making a gross total of revenue to the College of £45,583."

From all this it is clear that those speaking on behalf of Trinity College acted wisely in excluding the College, its endowments, its revenue, its controlling board and its system of carrying on the education of the nation, from the scope of the Royal Commission appointed to inquire into higher class education in Ireland. If the Commission had received power to investigate the affairs of Trinity, amongst other strange and unnatural phenomena that would come to light would be the absurd system of government that still rules the affairs of Trinity. It is a fact that the affairs and administration of the College are altogether in the hands of the Provost and seven Senior Fellows who constitute the Board. These are supposed to be men of vigour and great intellectual eminence, men who shine in the world of historical or literary research. That I cannot speak about, but what is the fact regarding their ages? I understand they are all old men, beyond the allotted span of life,—unlike the Civil Service or any other business in the world supposed to be conducted by men of vigour and men free from all physical complaints. Let me read for the information of the House the names and the ages of the distinguished gentlemen who are supposed, from day to day, to discharge the multitudinous duties entrusted to the keeping of a Board who have the name and the character and efficiency of a great University in their keeping—

The average age of the governors is seventy-one and one-eighth years. It is absurd to think that a body of gentlemen so old and decrepit could possibly be able to attend to the affairs of such a great institution as the University of Dublin. Let the House picture to itself the position of Ireland to-day in respect to this great educational grievance. Ireland has a population of over 4,500,000, and for 4,500,000 of people Ireland has one teaching University; while on the other hand, Scotland with a lesser population, has four, England has seven, Germany has twenty-two and in addition innumerable schools of the highest possible rank. And yet there are people to be found who wonder at the backward condition of the Irish people, and they grow wild and furious at the bare mention of setting up a national University for the education of the Catholic people of Ireland. How unreasonable and inconsistent they are, surely! They object to the establishment of a truly national University in Ireland, while at the same time they freely and willingly and generously endow a college for Mahommedans in Egypt. They maintain sectarian colleges in this country. They maintain, and justly so, in the north of Ireland, a University for the education of the Presbyterians of the north. They maintain every form of education in Ireland on strictly sectarian principles. Why, in the year 1852 Her late Majesty granted a Charter providing for the University education of her Catholic subjects in Canada, where the Catholic population was only 40 per cent. as against 90 per cent. in Ireland. You endow a Jewish College in Stephen's Green, and while you do all this, you hesitate and refuse to set up and endow a truly national University for the Catholics of Ireland. We have oftentimes been told that the reason why you oppose our fair and legitimate demands is because you think we are wishful and desirous of setting up an exclusively Catholic University—one governed by Roman Catholic bishop and priests. That is a false charge to prefer against us. We have asked and we continue to demand, and shall persist in our importunity till you satisfy us, till you give us a University that will satisfy—to quote Mr. Balfour's words—"The legitimate aspirations of the Catholics," a University which in its inception and government shall be truly national and acceptable to the great mass of the Irish people. The Irish people will never accept any system which banishes religion out of the schools, and the House should bear in mind it is dealing with a county where four-fifths of the people are Catholics. And how, therefore, is it possible to disregard and set at naught the religious convictions of the people? The idea is impossible. It is simply monstrous to ask any Irish Catholic—when the time has arrived for perfecting his education—to leave his country, to leave his religion, to bid good-bye to the associations of religion and home, and to enter an institution where he finds himself in an atmosphere of rigid Protestantism. For, notwithstanding the changes effected in Trinity College within recent years, it is yet openly and aggressively a centre of Protestant thought and learning. It was founded and endowed for proselytising purposes, and the endowment included a Divinity school. After two hundred years of proscription, it is not long ago since positions of emolument were thrown open to Catholics. Yes, but some may say, "Is not all that bigotry and exclusion a thing of the past—Catholics are no longer shut out. Tests and disabilities have been removed." That is so, to a limited extent; but it is a well-known fact that the College is not acceptable or considered congenial for my co-religionists in Ireland. It was bred low and reared in Protestantism. It is Protestant in its history. It is Protestant in its customs and religious observances. It is as Protestant to-day as ever. Ninety per cent. of its students are Protestants. The Provost, the Fellows, and all the Professors are of the same religion, and consequently it is absurd and ridiculous for anybody to contend that it is suited to the wants and requirements of my fellow-countrymen. Is it not the height of madness to expect the Catholics of Ireland to be satisfied with it as a means of University education? It is, and, what is more, in face of the persistent and continual opposition offered to our claims for equality in University Life. The time has arrived at last when the leaders of public opinion in Ireland must take up a definite and determined stand in respect to the matter. And now that the way is cleared, inasmuch as the land question, slowly but gradually, is moving out of the way, it is a matter of urgent practical politics to concentrate their attention and undivided energies in having this great national question settled once and finally. Trinity, no doubt, is a great, historic institution, with long and ancient traditions behind it. It has given to the world some great and illustrious men, but as compared with its opportunities it has done very little. There is no good, however, in crying over the past. What is gone is gone and cannot be recalled. Let us look to the future. Let the new Government handle this grave and complicated problem in a brave, upright, and righteous manner. If they do so, I am almost certain the day is not far distant when our land—once a nation of poets, bards, dramatists, orators, preachers, children of wit and children of fancy—will once again regain its position amongst the most learned and scholarly on this earth.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) seconded the Motion. He said it was not possible for him to say, in the time available to-night, one-tenth of what he had intended to say, but he would state a number of facts which, he imagined, would be a revelation to hon. Members on both sides of the House with reference to Dublin University, in order to show that there was great need for thorough inquiry into the administration of that institution. During the régime of the late Government he put a notice on the Paper asking for a return in regard to the administration, the revenues, and the method of teaching at Trinity College. The junior Member for the City of London said that the return could not be given, and the right hon. Gentleman referred him for information on the subject to a number of documents which he named. He would give briefly the result of his researches, and he might say that he could prove his statements up to the hilt by documents. His researches went to show that Trinity College was gravely mismanaged with reference to the distribution of its finances, the appointment of teachers, and the bestowal of degrees. Speaking as a Protestant, and with no feeling of unkindness towards Trinity College, where he had himself been a public examiner, he said that under its present management it was unacceptable to the very class for whom it was intended. For one in the Protestant community who would openly approve it, nine would condemn. The number of students who received the M.A. degree in 1886 was 1,346, while in 1903 the number had declined to 938. Oxford and Cambridge Universities were filled with Protestant Irishmen who went there rather than to their own colleges. That very day at University College the election had taken place of a Protestant Irishman as master. The Chancellor of Trinity College, Lord Rosse, sent his son to Oxford. It was notorious that Trinity College was not acceptable, not only to Roman Catholics, but to what might be called the cream of the intellect, of the Protestant nobility and gentry of Ireland. Of three men who were representatives in succession of Cambridge University all were Irish, and two were closely connected by antecedents with Trinity College. Out of £66,000 per annum £20,000 was divided among eight old men—the Provost and the seven senior Fellows, whose average age was seventy-one. That was how education was promoted in Ireland. As to the Fellowship training, while it involved enormous intellectual labour it did not give to any man who got a Fellowship any better position than a man who did not. Trinity College was called a teaching University. It was nothing of the kind. A young man might go there and get a degree and never attend a lecture. More than half of them did that. But whether they passed the examination or attended the lectures, they paid exactly the same fees. The fees, having regard to the class of students, were exorbitant. In the revenues of Trinity College must be included a sum of £122,000 which was given in 1869. From that day to this no account had been given of that money. He wished to know where it had gone. The Roman Catholics of Ireland, forming three-fourths of the population, would not have anything to do with Trinity College. It was a monopolist institution which did not benefit even the class for whom it was intended. It had been converted into an Old Man's Society, and, as it at present stood, it blocked the way of higher education in Ireland. He appealed with confidence to the Chief Secretary to find a remedy for the present state of matters.

Mr. Swift MacNeill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That, in the opinion of this House, the revenues of Trinity College, Dublin, are not used to the best advantage for the promotion of the higher education of the Irish people, and that, in view of the deplorable condition of higher education in Ireland, it is of vital and urgent importance that the control and administration of these large revenues should be so altered as to make them available for the use of the general body of the nation."—(Mr. Duffy.)

MR. CAMPBELL (Dublin University) thought the House would agree with him that no very great advance towards the solution of the most difficult of all Irish questions—namely, that of University education—was to be hoped for from such a Resolution as this. This question of the administration of Dublin University had already formed the subject of investigation by a Royal Commission and of frequent debate in this House, and on each and every occasion there had been a remarkable consensus of opinion in favour of the enlightened policy and wisdom of that administration. The Royal Commission of 1853 found that enormous improvements of an important character had been introduced from time to time by the authorities of Trinity College, that the general state of the University was satisfactory, and that the spirit of improvement had been especially shown in the changes that had been introduced in the course of education to adapt it to the requirements of the age. In the course of a speech on the Second Reading of the Irish Universities' Bill in 1873 Mr. Gladstone, who was then Prime Minister, said he had a strong sentiment of veneration and gratitude for Trinity College, which had done for Ireland a large portion of the good which had been done for her at all; and the late Sir William Harcourt, in the course of the same debate, spoke of Dublin University as one of the most famous Universities of the world and the intellectual eye of Ireland. Mr. Pynn, the then Liberal Member for Dublin, also said that Trinity College had been the one successful institution in Ireland. In the same year, speaking in this House, Mr. William Redmond, who as a Home Ruler represented the City of Wexford, stated that the Roman Catholics of Ireland took pride in the renown of the Dublin University. That was the University of which the hon. and learned Member for South Donegal had spoken to-night. It was the University which so far back as 1794 petitioned the Irish Parliament and obtained through it permission to admit to its degrees the Roman Catholics of Ireland, anticipating by thirty years the occasion when the Imperial Parliament granted Catholic emancipation. In 1873 it came to the Imperial Parliament and obtained the abolition of all tests of every kind within the walls of the University. From that hour to this there was no prize or position of profit, emolument or government within the University, that was not open to all, without distinction, of class or creed. Three of its Fellowships had been held in recent years by members of the Presbyterian Church, and one by a distinguished member of the Roman Catholic Church. In the face of these facts, it was idle for hon. Members from Ireland to come to this House and endeavour, under a Motion of this sort, to obtain a vote in favour of a foundation on a sectarian basis. The hon. Member for South Donegal had said that there were seven senior Fellows who had entrusted to them the management of this institution and that they and the Provost had absorbed £12,000 a year of the funds of the College, but with beautiful Hibernian exaggeration the hon. Gentleman went on to increase that £12,000 to £20,000.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL said that what he had stated was that the senior Fellows got £11,000 odd, the Provost £2,500, and that the expenses of administration amounted to one-third of the income of the College.

MR. J. CAMPBELL said he did not know by what arithmetic £2,500 and £11,000 produced £20,000. The facts as to the payments to senior Fellows had never been kept back from the House. Returns were furnished year by year until 1874, and one was furnished in 1889. There were seven of those senior Fellows, whose names would enable the House to judge whether they were men who from age or infirmity were unfit to be entrusted with the management of an institution of this sort. They included Professor Williamson, Professor Mahaffy, Professor Tarleton, and Professor Tyrrell, all men with a European reputation for culture and scholarship, all men whose works were to-day the standard textbooks in the particular subjects in which they excelled. After some thirty years of splendid service in the cause of education the seven divided amongst them a sum of £9,900 a year, or an average income of some £1,400 a year, an amount far below what they would have earned had they devoted their abilities to commercial or professional life. It was only within recent years that there was any provision made whereby they could be pensioned. The compensation for the loss of presentation rights on the disestablishment of the Irish Church, about which inquiry had been made, was merged in the general funds of the college, subject to the permission given by a Queen's letter in 1880 to use the income of the fund for the pensioning of Fellows who became incapable of discharging their duties, provided that in no year should these pensions exceed the annual amount of £5,000. The hon. Members ought hardly to grudge to the author of "Who fears to speak of '98," the only gentleman who was in receipt of a pension under that scheme after fifty-three years, the amount he drew of £1,000 a year. It was said that the revenues had not been made available for the bulk of the Roman Catholic youth of Ireland. It was true that many distinguished Roman Catholics had received their education within the walls of Trinity College. It was true that there were on the Irish Bench and in this country many distinguished Roman Catholics who owned much to the education they received there. But it was equally true that the great majority of the Catholic youth of Ireland had not been allowed to avail themselves of the educational benefits the institution offered. Ever since 1873 every distinction, privilege, office, and honour had been open to every Irishman, but in 1869 the Roman Catholic Bishops of Ireland met in solemn conclave and passed this resolution, from which they had never departed—

> "We condemn the mixed system of education, whether primary, intermediate, or university, as grievously and intrinsically dangerous to the morals of Catholic youth, and we declare that to Catholics only, and under the supreme control of the Church in all things appertaining to faith and morals, can the teaching of Catholics be entrusted."

Here was the reason why the advantages of higher education freely offered since 1873 had not been availed of as they might have been. Let those who doubted it read the remarkable and powerful letter published some two months ago by Mr. Michael Davitt, an Irishman and a Catholic, who for twenty years had been a Member of this House, in which he demonstrated that the irreconcilable hostility of the Catholic Bishops had deprived him and his co-religionists of the benefit of University education for half a century. Let the saddle be put on the right horse, and let it not be said that this was due to the intolerance and bigotry of Dublin University. The University had ever been in advance of the age in this matter. This was a question affecting a great and ancient institution; he regretted that so little time was left for discussion, and he would not stand between the House and the Chief Secretary. Speaking as an Irishman, and as one proud of his native country, his hope was that the University of Dublin might yet be permitted to become in fact what in name it had been for centuries—the great University where the youth of Ireland could engage in friendly educational rivalry, and while so engaged learn by mutual association abiding sentiments of toleration and respect truly essential for national prosperity, but which they could not learn while imprisoned in rival sectarian compounds, perpetuating the religious differences of the past which had numbed and paralysed the energy of his countrymen. He hoped the House would lend no favour to an attack on Trinity College as profitless as it was ungenerous.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.), said it was impossible for him at that late hour to enter upon several of the interesting questions which had been raised and which, had time permitted, he would have gladly dealt with. He would confine himself to the essential points and to a statement of the intentions of the Government. He was rather surprised that the right hon.and learned Gentleman who had just sat down should have spoken of a 'crusade" against Trinity College. It seemed to him that the remarks about Trinity College were not couched in any hostile or angry spirit, and he certainly did not put that construction upon them. It seemed to him most natural that hon. Members from Ireland, whatever their religious and political opinions were, should be interested in the welfare of so great an institution, which was an ornament to Dublin and to the whole of Ireland, and should wish that this ancient centre of intellectual life should again fill the place it ought to fill in the intellectual and moral life of the country. The complaints made against the college had not, after all, been very serious. It had been alleged that it was a mistake to have a college and a University governed by a body of eight men all advanced in life, that many Protestants left Ireland to go to Universities elsewhere, and that in some respects the arrangements for awarding Fellowships were not satisfactory. The hon. Member for South Donegal observed that these gentlemen had, at any rate, learned the art of living long. He thought every one's experience would convince him that there was nothing that kept a man so long in life as the possession of a good place from which he was keeping somebody else. The hon. Gentleman complained that Irishmen went to English Universities. The same thing was found in Scotland. The fact was that the English Universities were able to afford inducements which drew people away from smaller and poorer countries. That was a fact in modern life which they regretted, but which it was beyond their power to control. All that Dublin could do was so to arrange her endowments and organise her teaching as always to have a certain number of first-rate men whose presence would attract students from England and Scotland. As to the relation of Trinity College to Roman Catholics, the hon. Member for South Galway was not quite correct in saying that Trinity College had always been strictly Protestant. It was not so in the eighteenth century during the Commonwealth, and then for a considerable period it bade fair to be the centre of Catholic as well as Protestant life. The first period, unfortunately, came to an end at the time of Archbishop Laud, and the second period was about 1795. After that Trinity College, instead of being a meeting place for different schools and parties where young men might form friendships which would have averted political antagonisms, became the fortress of one religious sect. Trinity College had not been inquired into since the year 1853, when the last Commission reported. Within that period there had been four Commissions of inquiry into the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and three Commissions of inquiry into the Universities of Scotland. Six new Universities had been founded in England, and there had been a complete revolution in English University life. There had been an increase in the number of students in English Universities from a little over 2,300 in 1865 to 13,000 in the present year. That extraordinary revolution in University life in this country had been accompanied by the inquiries to which he had referred, and by alterations in the statutes and arrangements of the English and Scottish Universities, due to the development of new subjects of study and research. Since 1853, with the partial exception of an inquiry into a particular class of funds in 1878, there had been no inquiry with regard to Trinity College, Dublin. That fact had convinced him that primâ facie there was a strong case for a new inquiry into the arrangements of Trinity College. He thought that case was strengthened by the consideration that the recognition of new studies, especially scientific studies, was not adequate in the Fellowship examinations, that the system of government seemed antiquated, and that there had been some diminution in the number of students as compared with 1880–85. In these circumstances, with no imputation whatever upon Trinity College, against which he did not think any charge ought to be brought, and which had shown itself thoroughly loyal in every respect to the principles which it adopted in 1873, when the Abolition of Tests

Act was passed, after all these years. and after all that had been done in England and Scotland, he thought the time had come when there ought to be an inquiry into Trinity College also. He might say he had arrived at that conclusion independently, and should have announced it before long, even if this Motion had not given a proper opportunity for announcing it. The inquiry ought to deal with the revenues of the College, and the manner in which they were applied, the government and the administration of the College and the University, the teaching staff and methods, the system of examinations, and the rewards which successful students obtained. He thought it would necessarily also deal with the method of awarding the Fellowships, and, of course, one would not exclude from the purview of such an inquiry the general consideration of the place which Trinity College occupied in Ireland in the higher education of the country. He thought the inquiry ought to be conducted by a small Commission, which was more likely to be effective for this purpose, and by a non-political Commission, because it would not have any political question to consider, and it ought to act promptly. The last thing he personally desired was to postpone any attempt that any one might make to deal with the Irish University question at large by the creation of another Commission which would last for a long time, take a great deal of evidence, and practically put off the approach of this question for a greater time than any of them desired. After what he had said, he thought he might fairly ask the hon. Member to withdraw his Motion. The object of the hon. Member had been attained; he had given a statement which he trusted would be satisfactory to the hon. Member as regarded the course which the Government proposed to adopt, and he promised him that, as soon as it was possible to institute this inquiry, he would endeavour to do so. He hoped the inquiry, which he had reason to believe would not be unacceptable to the authorities of Trinity College—it was not designed in a hostile spirit to them, and he did not think they would take it in any such spirit—would have the effect of strengthening Trinity College, of improving it in any point in which it was desirable that it should be improved, of enlarging its range and giving it a wider influence on the Irish people, and of enabling it to discharge its duties to the Irish people in a manner worthy of the high standard of teaching it had always maintained, and of the many illustrious names with which it had been associated.

Mr. JOHN REDMOND said it was exceedingly difficult for his colleagues and himself to express in the time at their disposal a considered opinion on the speech of the right hon. the Chief Secretary. But he felt bound to say that they viewed with the most intense distrust the appointment of Commissions, and were it not for the concluding words of the right hon. Gentleman, in which he said his intention was that it should be a small Commission to meet at once and to report rapidly on a limited reference, he could not have advised his hon. friend, as he did now, to withdraw his Motion. As the same time he must safeguard himself by saying that without further examination, and without knowing a little more about the exact reference to the Commission, and something about those who were to be appointed upon it, he could take no responsibility for it whatever.

SIR EDWARD CARSON (Dublin University) said that if it was meant by referring the question to a Commission to turn Trinity College into a different kind of University for the purpose of satisfying sectarian ambition in Ireland, he feared that the right hon. Gentleman's scheme would not be acceptable to Trinity College. Of course, however, it was impossible, until one saw the scheme, to express an opinion.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

SUPPLY [19TH MARCH] REPORT.

Order read, for resuming adjourned Debate on Question [20th March], "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the Resolution, 'That a sum, not exceeding £10,220,000, be granted to His Majesty, to defray the Charge for the Pay, &c., of His Majesty's Army (including Army Reserve) at Home and Abroad (exclusive of India), which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1907.' "

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD (Liverpool, West Derby) continuing his speech, which had been interrupted by the suspension of the sitting at half-past seven, said he intervened simply to make a few remarks upon the pay and allowances of our Regular soldiers. His object was to appeal from the civilian point of view to the Secretary of State for War to do something to improve the lot of the common soldier, and at the point when he finished his service not to leave him to join what appeared to be the only occupation open to him, the ranks of the casual labourer. The great reason why no respectable parent could with equanimity see a son join the Army was that he knew that the lad's life was practically spoiled, and that after a few years in the Army he would be thrown adrift without a trade. In Manchester, Birmingham, and other large cities, they were trying to find employment for men who were out of work, and the retired soldier was one of their greatest and most pitiable difficulties. It was a pitiable system under which one had to tell a man of good physique and good character that there was nothing for him to do but casual labour. We wanted good men for the Army, and to get them they must be treated as human beings. At present they did not get that treatment, and there was no railway company or private firm who would treat their employés as we did our soldiers. The pay and emoluments of the soldier compared very badly with those of the sailor who left the Navy with a training and was a handy man who generally found something to do. There was no such opportunity for the soldier. He hoped the whole question of the reorganisation of the Army would be taken into consideration.

Question put, and agreed to.

Stamping of Documents at Provincial Post Offices.

MR. BARKER (Penrhyn and Falmouth): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he will provide facilities for stamping documents in county boroughs, the present method of handing in such documents at a post office for transmission to London being attended with inconvenience and delay, especially in the case of ships, which have often been well on the voyage before the documents were available.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) The matter is one that concerns the Board of Inland Revenue and not the Post Office. Facilities of the kind desired are already at twenty-six places outside London (see List annexed); whether, in fact, the amount of business to be transacted appears to justify the cost of providing stamping facilities. Even in places where such facilities are not provided, documents deposited for stamping can, as a rule, be reclaimed not later than the second day after being handed in, and it is not found in practice that inconvenience results from this short delay.

Wheat Prices.

MR. DUNDAS WHITE (Dumbartonshire): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will state the average prices of imported wheat, per quarter, in 1901, 1902, 1903, 1904, and 1905, in Germany, inclusive and exclusive of the German duty on such imported wheat; and the amounts of that German duty on imported wheat, per quarter, for the years referred to.

Years.	Average prices of imported wheat in Germany. Per quarter.		Amount of Customs duty levied on imported wheat in Germany. Per quarter.
	Inclusive of import duty.	Exclusive of import duty.

1905	38 6	30 11	7 7

Note.—The average import prices are given in the German official statistics, exclusive of import duty. The figures in column 1 have, therefore, been obtained by adding the amount of the import duty to the prices stated in the German Returns.

Irish Provident Assurance Company—Board of Trade Investigation.

Mr. KENDAL O'BRIEN (Tipperary, Mid.): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the investigation into the affairs of the Irish Provident Assurance Company has yet been concluded; and, if so, will he state the result.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George): Certain investigations into the affairs of the company were undertaken by the authorities at Dublin. The Board of Trade have recently learnt that it has been decided that no evidence existed to justify proceedings being taken by the authorities against the company. As a result of the investigation by the Board of Trade, the Department are advised that the company is not empowered to transact life assurance business, but the Board have also been informed that the company proposes that it should transact such business in conjunction with a life assurance company, constituted last year under the Companies' Acts, which has made the statutory deposit of £20,000. If, however, the hon. Member can bring to the notice of the Board of Trade evidence that the Irish Provident Assurance Company are themselves still carrying on business which could be described as life assurance, the question of taking proceedings against them will be considered.

Foreign Rails for British-owned Argentine Railways.

Mr. HOUSTON (Liverpool, West Toxteth): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that orders for over 100,000 tons of rails have recently been placed in the United States of America by British-owned Argentine railways; whether he can state what quantities of rails and steel sleepers for British-owned Argentine railway companies have recently been purchased from German and Belgian manufacturers; and whether he can state the reasons for these railway companies placing their orders in foreign countries instead of in Great Britain as hitherto.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I have no official information to the effect stated, but I have heard rumours of some arrangements made by an international rail syndicate for the division of the world's market for rails, whereby

I believe, inter alia, British rail-makers were to be secured (with certain reserves) from foreign competition in the markets of the British Empire, and the American manufacturers in those of North and South America. I am unable to say how far any such arrangement is actually carried out, or whether Argentine railway companies have recently purchased rails and steel sleepers from German or Belgian manufacturers.

MR. HOUSTON: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if there is official information to the effect that British railmakers have agreed with the American railmakers to allow orders for Argentine rails (on account of English companies) to be secured by the Americans, in consideration of their refraining from sending rails to this country and selling them at a price with which British makers could not compete; and, if there is such or any information in connection therewith, will he lay the same upon the Table.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I must refer the hon. Member to my Answer to his previous Question on the same subject.

Housekeeper of Dublin Custom House.

MR. T. HARRINGTON (Dublin Harbour): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the person who discharges the duty of housekeeper in the Dublin Custom House is permanently appointed to the position, or whether the office is regarded as vacant; and, if so, how long has the vacancy existed, and if it is the intention of the Customs authorities to appoint to the position an official from London who has hitherto had no connection with the Dublin Custom House.

(Answered by Mr. George Whiteley.) The office in question was vacated on the 7th December last. The present occupant has only a temporary tenure, pending a settlement, which is now being considered, of the duties and emoluments attaching to the post. I am not yet in a position to say what definite appointment to this vacancy will be made.

Entry of Dartmouth and Osborne Cadets.

MR. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that under the old system of limited competition for cadetships at Dartmouth there has only been a withdrawal of two cadets out of 191 entered, although paragraph 17 of the regulations respecting naval cadets lays down that it is to be distinctly understood that the period of training is a time of probation; and whether, having regard to the fact that during the same period, of 222 boys entered at Osborne under the new system 32 have been withdrawn, the Admiralty will reconsider the present scheme of entry, since each cadet lost costs the country, according to official figures, £98 per annum.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The figures quoted have already been given in reply to a Question in this House; and the Answer to the second Question is in the negative.

Manufacture of Turbine Machinery for War Vessels.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, in view of the contemplated employment of steam turbines in war vessels, he can state whether provision is being made in the dockyards of suitable workshops and machinery for their manufacture; or whether it is proposed to rely entirely on private firms to supply them.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) It is proposed to rely on private firms for the supply of steam turbines, as in the case of all other propelling machinery.

Compensation for Destruction of Fishing Gear by Warships in the Arran Islands.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the loss and destruction of nets, mooring gear, and fishing apparatus sustained by the Arran Island fishermen, on account of three English battleships tearing through their fishing grounds on the morning of the 15th March; and whether, in view of the poverty of the fishermen, and that they are now practically destitute and without the means of following their livelihood, he will at once take steps to compensate them for the injury done.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) It appears, from the report received this morning, that after the "Canopus" had anchored in Galway Bay the turn of the tide drifted some fishing nets across her bows. In clearing the nets they became so torn as to be rendered useless. The Admiralty have considered the question of compensation and propose to award the sum asked for.

Metropolitan Volunteers — The Brigade System.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): To ask the Secretary of State for War if, having regard to the opportunities for consecutive training of the 30,000 Volunteers in London throughout the year and to the zeal of all ranks, the brigade system recommended by the Norfolk Commission, and about to be adopted in provincial districts, will also be established in the metropolitan area.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) It is not proposed at present to extend the system by which each brigade of Volunteers will have a commander to itself to those brigades which are under regiments of Foot Guards. The advisability of such extension will, however, be carefully considered.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware, having regard to the fact that in a recent notice of a vacancy in the office of drill gun instructor in the Hibernian Military School, Dublin, Lord Grenfell, in inviting applications for the appointment, stated that membership of the Church of England was a necessary qualification for candidature, that every post of emolument in that institution, from the position of commandant to that of gatekeeper, is filled by a member of the Church of England or some other Protestant communion, no member of the staff being a Catholic; and what explanation, if any, has he to give for this exclusion of Catholics from positions in a school for the education of the sons of Irish soldiers, the great majority of whom are members of the Catholic faith.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) There are eighty-three appointments at the Royal Hibernian Military School which carry emoluments: of these forty-eight are held by Roman Catholics, twenty-eight by members of the Church of England, five by Presbyterians, and two by Wesleyans.

Purchase of Land by the War Office in Monmouthshire.

Colonel HERBERT (Monmouthshire, S.): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether the War Office is in negotiation, or has been in negotiation, for the purchase of any lands in the parishes of Monmouth or of Wonastow, in the County of Monmouth, adjoining the Monmouth rifle range.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) Certain negotiations were in progress concerning the acquisition of firing rights over land adjoining this range, but, as no money was available, the matter has dropped.

Sale of Sparkbrook Small Arms Factory.

Mr. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): To ask the Secretary of State for War if the Government has sold or leased the Sparkbrook Royal Small Arms Factory to a private company.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) Negotiations have been practically completed for the sale of Sparkbrook Royal Small Arms Factory to a private company.

The Imperial Yeomanry—Re-engagement System.

Mr. GIBBS (Bristol, W.): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will cause some alteration to be made in the system of re-engagement now in force in the Imperial Yeomanry, with a view to retain the good men as long as possible.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The system of re-engagement now in force was introduced, at the request of a large majority of commanding officers, in order to meet the convenience of the old yeomen and with the deliberate view of so retaining the good men. There is, therefore, no intention of altering the system.

The Proposed Labourers (Ireland) Bill.

MR. BARRIE (Londonderry, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland when he expects to introduce the promised Labourers (Ireland) Bill, the chief object of which is the cheapening and simplifying of the present Acts; and whether in drafting the Bill he will include in it provisions whereby labourers may be facilitated and encouraged to purchase their cottages and land by a series of reasonable annual instalments.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) It is impossible for me at present to fix a date for the introduction of the Labourers (Ireland) Bill, nor can I make any statement as to its provisions.

Cost of Erection and Loans on Workmen's Houses in Ireland.

MR. BARRIE: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in order to encourage urban authorities in Ireland to proceed with the building of workmen's houses in towns, in many cases urgently required, he is prepared to recommend the advancing of the necessary funds at the rate for interest of 3¼ per cent. per annum, instead of the 3¾ per cent. at present asked; and whether he will instruct the Local Government Board to modify their architectural requirements for such houses, their requirements in the past adding much to the cost of the schemes put forward by urban authorities.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The rates of interest for loans obtained by local authorities from public funds are fixed from time to time by the Treasury, regard being had to the state of the money market. There is, however, nothing to prevent such authorities from borrowing in the open market if by so doing they can secure better terms. I am advised that the architectural requirements of the Local Government Board have been framed with due regard to economy, and are only such as are necessary to secure healthy and well-constructed dwellings.

Monthly Return of Irish Emigration.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Registrar-General for Ireland will arrange for a monthly Return of Irish emigration to be published.

Fees Collected in Irish Model Schools.

MR. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Treasury have foregone their claim to any part of the school fees collected in the Irish model schools; and, if so, will the Commissioners of National Education distribute the fees collected in each model school among the teachers of that school, as is the practice in all ordinary national schools; or will they use part of this money in paying house rent for female teachers who have not been provided with residences, and distribute the remainder among the staffs of the various model schools where very small fees are collected; and will the teachers get a share as in those schools where considerable sums are received.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) Last year the Treasury agreed to forego their claim to the school fees collected from model school pupils, and sanctioned the following rules for payments to model school teachers out of such fees: (1.) To each head mistress appointed since 1st April 1900 £20 per annum as an allowance for a residence; in the case of a head mistress appointed as such after 1st April 1900, if she carried over from the old system model school supplementary salary gained as assistant before that date, the allowance for residence shall be only the excess, if any, of £20 above the amount so carried over; (2.) to each head master and head mistress appointed since 1st April 1900 £10 per annum, to stand in the place of endowment or local aid; (3.) the residue to be distributed among all the teachers (head teachers and assistants) at present serving, or hereafter appointed, in model schools, on the principle that the head teacher shall receive twice the share of an assistant. The school fees collected from model school pupils, between 1st April 1905 and 31st December 1905, have been paid to the model school teachers in accordance with these regulations.

Dromahane National School—Absence of Mr. T. Mullane.

MR. FLYNN (Cork Co., N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Commissioners of National Education (Ireland) received a memorial from the parents of children attending the national school, Dromahane, Mallow, in August 1905, complaining of the frequent absence from the school of the teacher, Mr. T. Mullane, in connection with repeated prosecutions of Mrs. O'Ragan, an evicted tenant, who has been sentenced to two terms of imprisonment; and, if so, what reply was sent by the Commissioners; and whether, in view of the ill-feeling excited in the locality by this land dispute, the Commissioners will make representation to the teacher, with a view to submitting the case to arbitration, as suggested by the school manager, Father Shinnick, and others.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that on the 30th August, 1905, they received from some of the parents of the pupils a memorial calling attention to Mr. Mullane's connection with land disputes. The Commissioners referred the memorial to the senior inspector for inquiry, and, upon consideration of his report, they decided to take no action in the matter. There has been no further correspondence, and the Commissioners have no knowledge of the suggested arbitration referred to in the Question.

Colonial Military Expenditure.

SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can give the House the latest information in his possession as to the expenditure on military purposes of the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia, and the Colonies of New Zealand, the Cape of Good Hope, and Natal.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) Expenditure on Military and Naval purposes of the self-governing Colonies:—

		Military.	Naval.	Military.	Naval.
30th June, 1904 -	Natal - - -	341,016‡	—	4,000	25,628

Later information can probably be obtained in about a week, by telegraphing, if the right hon. Member thinks this necessary.

Victorian Gold Mining Return.

MR. MARKHAM (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies will he say whether a Return, issued on 19th March, giving the yield of Victorian gold mines per ton of ore milled, includes or does not include tailings, concentrates, and silver.

Pay of Irish Survey Labourers.

Mr. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he will arrange that the Irish survey labourers and chain men will receive equal pay to that given to men in similar positions in England; whether he is aware that some of the Southampton unskilled labourers with a fixed abode receive higher wages than the Irish field sections who move from station to station; and whether this inequality of pay will be considered and remedied.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) The wages paid to survey labourers in the field are the same in Ireland as in Great Britain, with the exception of those at Southampton, where slightly higher rates are paid owing to the higher rate of wages generally paid for unskilled labour in the locality.

Board of Agriculture Inspectors.

Mr. WATT (Glasgow College): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether, in view of the fact that there are at present forty-three lay inspectors in the animals' division of the department who administer the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts, he will give a preference to veterinarians for these appointments if he can get them on the same terms as the lay inspectors; and will he explain why veterinary surgeons are not appointed to these positions.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) The question of the employment of veterinary surgeons on the non-professional business which our inspectors are called upon to perform has often been considered, but experience has shown that, as a rule, they are not so well suited to the work as men possessing qualification of a more general character. The non-professional inspectors are selected after personal inquiry and scrutiny by the President of the Board for the time being, and nearly all of them possess a knowledge or have had practical experience of agriculture.

Superannuation of Local Government Officials.

Mr. J. WILLIAMS BENN (Devonport): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can propose or facilitate legislation to secure superannuation for local government officials upon similar lines to the Poor Law Officers' Superannuation Act.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) I could not take steps for the purpose suggested. Indeed it appears to me that the subject of superannuation of local government officers would require careful consideration before legislation on the subject could be proposed.

Registered Trading Firms without Votes.

Mr. H. J. TENNANT (Berwickshire): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he can grant a Return showing in the municipalities of Glasgow, Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Birmingham, West Ham, Holborn, and Sheffield, theeaggregate rateable value, the number of registered trading firms who have no municipal vote, owing to their incorporation under the Companies Acts, and the aggregate rateable value of such trading companies.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) As regards Glasgow, the matter is one for my right hon. friend the Secretary for Scotland. So far as the other places mentioned are concerned, I shall be happy to give a Return of the kind suggested, and I will communicate with my hon. friend as to its form.

Pay of Royal Dockyards Writing Staff.

Mr. J. WILLIAMS BENN: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty when he will be able to announce the revision of the pay of the writing staff of the Royal Dockyards, referred to in page 98 of the Naval Estimates 1905–6, and again in the Navy Estimates 1906–7; and whether the revision will include the granting of the long-standing request of the naval writers to have an opportunity of attaining to warrant rank.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robinson.) It is hoped to publish at an early date the result of the inquiry into the pay and position of the civilian writers in the dockyard. This inquiry had no reference to the naval writers, and the Answer to the last part of the Question is in the negative.

Distribution of Orders for Armour Plate.

MR. WALTERS (Sheffield, Brightside): To ask the Secretary to the Anmiralty whether he will take steps to insure the distribution of orders for armour plate over a longer period of the year, so as to avoid the working of overtime and so as to afford more regular and continuous employment to the workmen engaged in this trade.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson). Every endeavour is and will be made to regulate the orders to the armour-plate manufacturers in such a way as to render overtime unnecessary.

Entrance Examination for Naval Cadets.

MR. BELLAIRS: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty who carried out the examinations under the old and new systems of entry for naval cadetships, and what fees are charged to the parents respectively; what proportion of candidates are nominated for each vacancy under each system; and whether the marks obtained at examinations are published in each case in order to preclude any possibility of favouritism after nominations have been awarded.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson). The literary examinations under the old system of entry were undertaken by the Civil Service Commissioners. Under the new system they are managed by the Oxford and Cambridge Board. The medical examinations have always been performed by the Medical Director General of the Navy and his staff. The fees charged to parents under the old system were £1 for each of three possible examinations; and, under the new system, £2 for the one qualifying examination. There is no fixed proportion of candidates chosen to attend the examinations. No marks are published in the case of the cadets entered under the new scheme. There is no such possibility as is suggested in the last part of the Question.

Promotion of Custom House Assistant Clerks.

MR. THORNTON (Clapham): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the duty of preparing the Board of Trade Returns in the Statistical Department of the Custom House devolves mainly upon assistant clerks; and, if so, whether he is disposed to grant to such officers of this class as may be considered worthy of promotion to higher posts, facilities equal to those enjoyed by clerks of the same grade serving in other Government offices.

(Answered by Mr. Kearley.) The duty of preparing the Board of Trade Returns in the Statistical Department of the Custom House devolves mainly upon assistant clerks, so far as the routine work is concerned, but their work is supervised at every stage by officers of higher rank. A memorial from the tabulator section of the assistant clerks is now under the consideration of the Treasury. No decision has yet been come to, but I must not be taken to admit that the advantages enjoyed by the assistant clerks in the Statistical Department are inferior to those of the same grade in the service generally.

Position of Temporary Civil Assistants in the Ordnance Survey.

MR. GIBBS: To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he will say when he will be able to make a public statement on the question of the position of the temporary civil assistants in the Ordnance Survey.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna): I have nothing at present to add to the Answer which I gave the hon. Member on the 14th instant. †

Clubs and the Licensing Act.

Mr. PAUL (Northampton): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that a number of clubs have been and are being formed throughout the country, nominally for social and political purposes, but really for drinking and for evasion of the Licensing Act; and whether His Majesty's Government can take any steps by administering or amending the law to check the progress of this grave evil.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) If any person is in possession of information that the provisions of the Licensing Act of 1902 in regard to clubs have been contravened he can himself take proceedings or move the police to do so. Whether the law requires strengthening is certainly a question for consideration in connection with licensing legislation.

Irish Land Purchase—Assessment of Income Tax.

Mr. COGAN (Wicklow, E.): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether occupiers of land who have purchased their holdings under the Land Purchase Acts in Ireland are liable to be assessed or to pay Income Tax under Schedule A on that portion of the annuity which is classed as interest as distinguished from sinking fund; and, if, so assessed, they have paid Income Tax on the full amount of the annuity, whether they are entitled to reimbursement by the Land Commission or the Treasury on so much of the annuity as may be regarded as interest on borrowed money and not repayment of capital.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) Occupiers of land who have purchased their holdings under the Land Purchase Acts in Ireland are primarily liable to be assessed on the annual value of their holdings, but no charge is made where the tenant purchaser's total income from all sources is proved to be less than £160. Where a tenant purchaser's total income from all sources is not proved to be less than £160, his holding is charged to Income Tax on the annual value; but, as the purchase annuity payable to the Land Commission is paid without deduction of Income Tax, it is the practice of the Inland Revenue Department, where possible, to reduce the assessment by the amount of the interest included in the annuity. If in any case reduction has not been granted prior to payment of the tax, the tenant purchaser can obtain a refund by applying to the Surveyor of Taxes for the district in which the property is situated.

Army Annual Bill—Committee Stage.

Sir CHARLES DILKE: To ask the Secretary of State for War when it is proposed to take the Committee stage of the Army (Annual) Bill.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) As the Bill has not yet been read a second time, I am afraid it is impossible for me to say when the Committee stage can be reached.

Martial Law in Crete.

Sir CHARLES DILKE: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether any Reports as to recent administration of so-called martial law by the British force in Crete towards insurgents should be the subject of inquiry from the Foreign Office or from the War Office.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) Any inquiry as to the results of the administration of martial law under the Consul General, who is not responsible to the War Office, would appear to be a matter for the Foreign Office. From the reports received the administration, so far as the British troops and the section for which they are responsible are concerned, has been entirely satisfactory.

Army Remounts in South Africa.

Mr. LANE-FOX (Yorkshire, W.R., Barkston Ash): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether any, and, if so, what steps have been taken to improve the supply and the quality of remounts for the troops in South Africa.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) 216 horses were sent out from England and Canada last year, and arrangements are being made to supply 1,000 from overseas this year. This is the only method of supply at present available, but it is understood that the Orange River Colony is taking action in the matter of breeding horses in South Africa.

Procedure Committee and Withdrawal of Strangers during Divisions.

Mr. MILDMAY (Devonshire, Totnes): To ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Committee on Procedure will be invited to consider the desirability of allowing strangers sitting beneath the Gallery to retain their seats during divisions.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) I do not know that this is a question that comes within the purview of the Committee on Procedure. I sympathise with the hon. Member's object, and I will consult the authorities of the House as to what steps can be taken to meet his views.

Troops under Control of Colonial and Foreign Offices.

Sir CHARLES DILKE: To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can state the number and cost of the forces having an organisation in troops or battalions or gun detachments, now under the control of the Colonial Office and Foreign Office respectively, or under the control of His Majesty's Government exercised otherwise than through the War Office or the Government of India.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) The number and cost of forces having an organisation in troops or battalions or gun detachments, now under the control of the Colonial Office (that is, exclusive of the self-governing Colonies of Canada, Australia, Cape Colony, and Natal; and Bermuda and Malta, where the troops are paid from Army funds), are as follows:—Total number, 47,920; total cost, £3,378,560. These figures include the South African Constabulary (4,500 men), for whom provision is made from Colonial funds (£1,317,755). There are no longer any forces under the control of the Foreign Office. There are no other forces under the control of his Majesty's Government exercised otherwise than through the War Office or the Government of India.

Heavy Motor Traffic on Highways.

Mr. NIELD (Middlesex, Ealing): To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether His Majesty's Government will inform the House if they propose to introduce, during the present session or in an early session of Parliament, legislation to deal with the question of the extraordinary traffic on highways, caused by the increase of heavy motors and traction engines using such roads, and to confer greater powers upon local authorities in respect of such traffic.

(Answered by Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman.) The Government do not contemplate proposing any legislation on the subject this session, and they cannot make any promise as regards next session.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Dartmouth Cadetships.

Mr. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that under the old system of limited competition for cadetships at Dartmouth there has only been a withdrawal of two cadets out of 191 entered, although paragraph 17 of the regulations respecting naval cadets lays down that it is to be distinctly understood that the period of training is a time of probation; and whether, having regard to the fact that during the same period, of 222 boys entered at Osborne under the new system 32 have been withdrawn, the Admiralty will reconsider the present scheme of entry, since each cadet lost costs the country, according to official figures, £98 per annum.

The SECRETARY to the ADMIRALTY (Mr. Edmund Robertson, Dundee): The figures quoted have already been given in reply to a Question in this House; and the Answer to the second Question is in the negative

Steam Turbines for War Vessels.

Mr. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, in view of the contemplated employment of steam turbines in war vessels, he can state whether provision is being made in the dockyards of suitable workshops and machinery for their manufacture; or whether it is proposed to rely entirely on private firms to supply them.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: It is proposed to rely on private firms for the supply of steam turbines, as in the case of all other propelling machinery.

Destruction of Arran Fishermen's Nets by British Battleships.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the loss and destruction of nets, mooring gear, and fishing apparatus sustained by the Arran Island fishermen, on account of three English battleships tearing through their fishing grounds on the morning of the 15th March; and whether, in view of the poverty of the fishermen, and that they are now practically destitute and without the means of following their livelihood, he will at once take steps to compensate them for the injury done.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: It appears from the report received this morning that, after the "Canopus" had anchored in Galway Bay, the turn of the tide drifted some fishing nets across her bows. In clearing the nets, they became so torn as to be rendered useless. The Admiralty have considered the question of compensation, and propose to award the sum asked for.

Transvaal Loan.

MR. GULLAND (Dumfries Burghs): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will state the names of the financial houses who undertook to raise the £10,000,000 Transvaal loan.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): The names of the South African firms who undertook to guarantee the issue of the first instalment of £10,000,000 of the war loan of £30,000,000 are given at page 3 of Cd. 1905.

Indian Coolies and the Transvaal Mines.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether His Majesty's Government are willing to sanction the importation of Indian coolies into the Transvaal on the terms of the British Guiana Ordinance.

MR. CHURCHILL: His Majesty's Government has not received any application from the Transvaal Government for the introduction of Indian coolies on the terms referred to by the hon. Member, and it is impossible to state beforehand the manner in which such an application would be dealt with.

Illegal Flogging of Chinese Coolies.

MR. HAROLD COX: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether coolies who have been illegally flogged in South Africa are entitled to recover damages for assault from any person or persons; and, if so, whether the Secretary of State will undertake that they shall be informed of the nature of their remedy and furnished with the necessary facilities for prosecuting it.

MR. CHURCHILL: A coolie is entitled to recover damages for illegal assault. Under the Labour Importation Ordinance of 1904, it is part of the duty of the superintendent and inspectors to inquire into any complaint which a coolie may have to make. In inquiring into any complaint, no doubt the superintendent or inspector would inform the coolie of any civil remedy open to him. The Secretary of State considers that in these circumstances it is not necessary to make any special notification to the coolies on the subject.

Dinuzulu.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the recent circulation of charges of treasonable intent against the Zulu chief, Dinuzulu; and whether, in view of the formal complaints of the Natal authorities in the past, that such charges against that chief are unfounded and mischievous, his department will confer with the Natal Government, with a view to taking proceedings against the person or persons now found to be responsible.

MR. CHURCHILL: I presume that the hon. Member refers to reports in the newspaper Press. The Natal Government are satisfied as to the loyalty of Dinuzulu and his people, and it is for that Government to decide whether it is desirable, and, if so, whether it is possible to take such proceedings as the hon. Member suggests. The Secretary of State does not feel called upon to intervene in the matter.

Kaffir Disturbances in Natal.

MR. J. M. ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can state the number of natives killed by order of court martial or otherwise in connection with the native disturbances in Natal; and how far the forces of the Crown have been employed either in enforcing the demand for a poll tax, or in repressing disturbances arising out of such demand.

MR. CHURCHILL: Up to the present I have only been informed of two natives having been shot after trial by court martial for assisting and taking part in the murder of an inspector and trooper of the Natal European Police Force. The battalion of Imperial troops which has been sent to Natal has not been actively employed in connection with the disturbances.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has any official information showing that the native unrest in South Africa is being manufactured in order to provide a pretext for taking from the natives the reservation lands set apart for them.

MR. CHURCHILL: No, Sir. The Secretary of State certainly has no such information.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON: May I ask whether information which renders possible such an inference of corrupt motives is contrary to the official information, and therefore, presumably, contrary to the fact?

MR. CHURCHILL: I said the Secretary of State had no information which would tend to support the stories inquired of by the hon. Member in his Question. I do not gather what further statement the hon. Member requires. We have no information on the subject.

Northern Nigeria Disturbances.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it has been decided to despatch an expedition against the Emir of Hadeija, in Northern Nigeria; what force will be necessary, and what are the circumstances which have rendered this step necessary.

MR. CHURCHILL: Sir F. Lugard has reported that the attitude of a section of the people of Hadeija, which threatens to disturb the peace, makes it advisable to arrest the leaders and for that purpose to strengthen the force which is already stationed there. He has been authorised to strengthen the force accordingly, but it is hoped that the object may be obtained without actual fighting. The strength of the increased force will be about 500 men of the Northern Nigeria Regiment of the West African Frontier Force.

Indo-China and Servian Trade Reports.

SIR SAMUEL SCOTT (Marylebone, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been drawn to the fact that the Report on the trade of Indo-China in 1903–4, and on the trade of Servia in 1904, were not published until February 1906; and whether there is any explantion of the delay in the issue of these Reports.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RUNCIMAN, Dewsbury) (for Sir Edward Grey): In the case of Indo-China the author of the Report which was published in January, not February, explained that he had found great difficulty in obtaining the requisite data. A preliminary Report on the trade of that country from October, 1903 to February, 1904 was, however, issued in May, 1904. There was no permanent British Consular officer in Tonking until July last. The annual Reports from that district will, no doubt, be furnished in future as soon as the Consul can obtain the statistics. In the case of Servia, the statistics for 1904 were not issued till the end of November last.

Administration of the Aliens Act.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will lay upon the Table the Report of the Expert Committee concerning the administration of the Aliens Act, and the rules made in accordance therewith, showing in red ink or distinctive type the alterations he has made therein, and a statement of the reasons upon which he has acted.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): The Report of the Committee in question was a confidential Report to the Secretary of State, and I regret that it would be contrary to principle to accede to the hon. Member's request that it should be laid upon the Table. For the rest, I need only refer to the Papers † which I presented yesterday in accordance with the promise which I made in this House on Wednesday last; and I may point out that, in addition to the Papers I then promised, I have presented the published Memorandum on the working of the Act, which contains the gist of the Committee's Report. As I have only revoked one existing Order and made one new Rule, both of which steps are well known to the House from my statement, there is no need for distinctive type. The reasons upon which I have acted were fully explained in last Wednesday's debate.

*MR. DUNCAN SCHWANN (Cheshire, Hyde): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to pictures of coursing for the Waterloo Cup, depicting the death agonies of a hare, which appear on the biograph at the Palace Theatre; and whether he proposes to take any steps to stop the continuance of this spectacle.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I have made inquiry into this matter, and I understand that the part of the picture to which objection was taken has now been withdrawn.

Working Men Inspectors of Mines.

MR. CORY (Cornwall, St. Ives): I beg to ask the Secretary of States for the Home Department whether the workmen of a colliery, in appointing two persons being practical working miners but not being two of their number, under General Rule 38 of The Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1887, should be required to furnish to the manager of such colliery proof that the two persons so appointed are practical working miners; and, if so, what proof should be given.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I think that in cases where men not working at the colliery are appointed to make an examination under this rule, a manager would be entitled to some proof that they are practical working miners as prescribed by the rule. I do not see why there should be any difficulty in furnishing this proof. The men appointed might, for instance, bring a reference from the manager of the colliery at which they work; or the names of the men and the collieries at which they work might be communicated to the manager beforehand in time to allow him to make inquiry.

MR. T. RICHARDS (Monmouthshire, W.) was understood to ask if the fact that the men were working in a mine would not be sufficient proof that they were practical workmen.

Coroner's Inquests on Licensed Premises.

MR. A. WILLIAMSON (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the fact that the provisions of Section 21 of The Licensing Act, 1902, prohibiting the holding of any coroner's inquest on licensed premises where other suitable premises have been provided for such inquest, will come into operation on March 31st, 1907, he will consider the advisability of addressing a communication to the local authorities of England and Wales, drawing their attention to the enactment in question and to the desirability of their, in the interval, making suitable provision, or otherwise securing accommodation, for such courts upon unlicensed premises, before the date named, in accordance with the intention of the Legislature.

*MR. GLADSTONE: I will consider what action I can properly take in the matter and whether I should issue a circular to county and borough authorities but it must be borne in mind that except in the county of London local authorities are not under any statutory obligation to provide places for the holding of inquests.

Charitable Institutions and the Merchant Shipping Act.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD (Liverpool, West Derby): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to Section 111 (2) of the Merchant Shipping Act, requiring a licence to be held for the prevention of crimping, and that under such section his Department now require that charitable institutions who train boys for the sea must take out a licence before they can apply to a shipowner to take these boys; and whether, in view of the effect of this requirement upon the committees of management of such institutions as the Metropolitan training ship "Exmouth," the training ship "Mount Edgcumbe," the Birkdale Farnworth Nautical School, Father Berry's Liverpool Training Homes, and the "Clio" and the Macclesfield Industrial School, he will, in proposing Amendments to such Act, be prepared to give facilities for their work to such institutions.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE, Carnarvon Boroughs): Yes, Sir. I am aware of the provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act with regard to the supply of seamen and boys to which the hon. Member refers. The requirements of the section are in the interests of the boys in the institutions named, and I do not quite understand what is meant by their effect upon the committees of management. I shall, however, be happy to consider any suggestion that may be made to me by which the work of such institution could be facilitated and the interests and safeguards now provided for the seamen and boys left untouched.

Carnarvon and Newry Granite Industry.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, having regard to the magnitude and importance of the manufacture and trade in granite paving sets, especially on the coasts of Carnarvonshire and the neighbourhood of Newry in Ireland, and the depression in that trade at present existing, owing to the importation of such sets from abroad free from any contribution to the Imperial Revenue or local rates and taxes, he would be prepared to favourably consider a proposal that all such foreign-made sets should pay an import duty at all events equivalent to the Imperial and local burdens which are incident to those manufactured in this country.

Delays on the District Railway.

*MR. NIELD (Middlesex, Ealing): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has received any official information or Report upon the subject of breakdowns and delays in the traffic on the District Railway between Ealing and the City; whether such delays are attributable to the fact that the rolling stock is of foreign construction; and whether, if he has not cognizance of the facts, he will direct an inquiry to be held to ascertain the cause of this public inconvenience.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have received a Report from the Metropolitan District Railway Company on the subject of the breakdowns on their line, and the purport of that Report is contained in the reply given to a Question put yesterday by the noble Lord the Member for Maidstone.† Upon the explanation given by the company it would appear that an inquiry of the nature suggested would not serve any useful purpose.

House of Commons Post Office.

MR. WILLIAM RUTHERFORD: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether his attention has been called to the fact that, arising out of the number of new Members in the present House of Commons, and the amount of correspondence requiring to be dealt with by the postal staff at the Members' post office in the House, delays have arisen in such post office, and it has recently become impossible to get the morning letters for Members at such post office before half-past ten o'clock in the morning; and whether he would be prepared to make some arrangements with a view to obviating this inconvenience.

Mr. BRIGG (Yorkshire, W.R., Keighley): I beg also to ask the Postmaster-General if, without making any important structural alterations in the post office in the Members' Lobby, he could, at an early date, arrange to give more accommodation at the windows, so as to facilitate the delivery of letters and the transaction of the other business of Members.

The POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. Sydney Buxton, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): The First Commissioner and I have together carefully considered the question of the House of Commons Post Office accommodation. It does not appear to be possible to make any important structural alterations which would improve the accommodation; and in any case, these could not be done while Parliament is sitting. We have, however, arranged to move the post box from its present position, and to place it in the corner of the Lobby. The space thus vacated will be utilised as an additional window of access for Members to the post office. In addition, a considerably larger number of pigeon holes will be erected inside the office, so as to expedite the sorting and delivery of letters to Members. These alterations will be carried out by my right hon. friend during the Easter Recess. Further, it has been arranged that a considerable portion of the sorting of the heavier packets shall be done in the outer office, instead of in the office in the Members' Lobby. Then, in order to relieve the accumulating congestion of letters and packets, which greatly hampers the work of the office, I have authorised the re-addressing of parcels without charge so that each day the post office will be cleared of them. I hope that these and other small changes will facilitate the delivery of letters and the transaction of the business of Members with the post office.

Post Office Savings Bank.

Mr. RENDALL (Gloucestershire, Thornbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether, having regard to the fact that deposits in the Post Office Savings Bank may not at present exceed £50 in any one year, or £200 in all, he will consider the desirability of increasing the maximum sum to be deposited to £500, with a view to further encourage safe methods of investment among the artizan classes which shall not be liable to market fluctuations.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: The question of the Post Office Savings Bank deposits is receiving consideration.

Mr. RENDALL: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he will consider the desirability of taking means to enable trustees of estates not exceeding in value £1,000 to be permitted to invest trust moneys in the Post Office Savings Bank in their own names as trustees.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: I doubt if it would be desirable to extend the present facilities of the Post Office Savings Bank in the direction indicated.

Stratford Inland Revenue Supervisor's Promotion.

Mr. MEEHAN (Queen's County, Leix): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury in reference to the recent promotion of a supervisor of Inland Revenue over more than a hundred of his seniors, whether he is aware that when this officer was promoted a few years ago, from a second to a first-class station, a special inquiry was ordered into the unsatisfactory manner in which he had performed his duties in connection with licensing matters; whether this was considered when promoting him over the heads of those who had never been the subject of complaint; and whether, when this officer was stated to have been assigned to Stratford, as being a more advantageous appointment than that to Salisbury, the Board of Inland Revenue had in view the fact that the total duty from all sources in the Salisbury district is fully three times that in Stratford, and that Stratford is one of the least important districts in England.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. McKenna, Monmouthshire, N.): No such inquiry was ordered nor was there any complaint of the kind suggested. With regard to the last part of the question I would observe that the amount of revenue collected is by no means the only criterion of the importance of an appointment. In this particular instance the officer was appointed to Stratford at his own request. As none of his seniors desired the post the Board, following their usual practice, complied with his wishes.

Mr. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether in consequence of the guarantee demanded by Argentine buyers of breeding cattle that these shall stand the tuberculin test when landed in Argentina, it is the custom for sellers in this country to submit the animals to the test before sending them; and whether those animals that fail to answer the test are used for breeding stock in this country.

Sir EDWARD STRACHEY: We have no information to show whether the practice referred to by my hon. friend is customary or not. There is nothing in the present state of the law to prevent owners from testing their cattle with tuberculin, and subsequently using them for breeding purposes.

Scottish Education Circulars.

Mr. CROMBIE: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether he can arrange for copies of the most important of the minutes and circulars of the Education Board being delivered to Scotch Members at the House of Commons.

The SECRETARY for SCOTLAND (Mr. Sinclair, Forfarshire): All Minutes of the Department are laid on the Table of the House and copies can be obtained in the usual way at the Vote Office. A collection of the more important circulars of the Department up to that date was published in May, 1904. The circulars issued since that date, are few in number and have all been published in the annual Blue-book.

Board of Education for Scotland.

Mr. SMEATON (Stirlingshire): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland whether a Board of Education for Scotland, distinct from the Scotch Education Department, still exists; if not, whether the powers and duties of the said Board have devolved on the said Department; whether, if such devolution has taken place, the office and general place of business of the said Department are in Edinburgh or in London; and if the office and general place of business of the said Department are in London, whether, in view of Sub-Clause 2 (read with the concluding words of Sub-Clause 6) of Clause 3 of the Education (Scotland) Act of 1872, he will say what steps he proposes to take.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The Board of Education established for certain temporary purposes by Section 3 of the Act of 1872 has ceased to exist and its powers and duties have devolved upon the Department. The Department which is a department of the Privy Council, has offices both in London and Edinburgh. Sub-section 2 of Section 3 of the Act of 1872 to which the hon. Member refers has been repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act of 1883.

Reductions of Irish Rents.

Mr. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why, whereas the Land Commissioners and Sub-Commissioners, when fixing rents on yearly tenancies in 1896–7, gave reductions averaging, for the whole of Ireland, more than 27 per cent. on both first and second-term rents, in 1904–5 they gave reductions of only 14·8 on first-term and 15·8 on second-term rents, and they are at present giving smaller reductions or none; and will he enable the public to test the statistics used in arriving at these decisions and method of using them, and especially the method according to which rents appear to be increased by any enhanced value of the holding, due solely to the tenant's labour and money.

*The CHIEF SECRETARY for IRELAND (Mr. Bryce, Aberdeen, S.): I am informed by the Land Commission that first-term statutory rents fixed by Chief and Sub-Commissions in the year 1896–7 showed an average reduction of 27·6 per cent., and the second-term statutory rents an average reduction of 27 per cent. The corresponding figures for the year 1904–5 were 14·8 and 15·8 per cent., respectively. And for the period of nine months ending December 31st last the figures were 18·9 and 15·8, respectively. I have already pointed out to the hon. Member that Parliament has placed the determination of rents in the hands of the Land Commission. Their decisions in the matter are judicial decisions, and I am not aware that I have any power to inquire into the merits of those decisions. I have repeatedly stated that the Land Commission inform me that it is not the fact that rents are increased upon tenants' improvements.

MR. GINNELL inquired if copies of the rules and instructions to the Commissioners were not yet obtainable by Members of the House?

*MR. BRYCE said he would inquire.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.) complained that the tenants did not get the full benefit of the improvements which they themselves made.

Irish Landlords and Poor Rates.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland to state the gross amount of poor rates of which Irish landlords have been relieved under Section 52 of the Local Government (Ireland) Act, 1898, year by year, since that Act came into operation; and if there is any monetary deduction, set-off, or other advantage derived by the tenants or by the public from or in consequence of that relief to the landlords, to state its amount, year by year, during the same time.

MR. BRYCE: The Local Government Board are unable to afford the information asked for in the first part of the Question. In reply to the latter inquiry, I may refer the hon. Member to Section 48 of the Act quoted, which provides for the annual payment, in relief of rates on agricultural land, of a sum taken on the basis of a standard year, which has been certified to amount to £727,650.

Irish Land Sub-Commissioners.

MR. GINNELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland how many lay sub-commissioners are now in the service of the Irish Land Commission; how many of them have had practical experience as rent-paying farmers, depending entirely or mainly upon the profits of that occupation for their living; and, if any, will he state the number of years of such experience previous to appointment as sub-commissioners.

MR. BRYCE: Fifty-six lay assistant commissioners are at present in office. The Land Commissioners inform me that they have no information as to how many of these have had practical experience as rent-paying farmers depending entirely or mainly upon the profits of that occupation for their living. A Return which was presented pursuant to an Order of the House in 1902 (No. 151) sets forth certain particulars in respect of each assistant commissioner then in office, and all those who are now serving are included in that Return. The Return shows, among other particulars, the acreage of land farmed by each assistant commissioner prior to his appointment and whether he held as owner or tenant.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kildare, S.): Will the Return show the profits made by the sub-commissioners?

MR. BRYCE: That would be information very difficult to get.

MR. KILBRIDE: They could give it, but they would not care to.

MR. LONSDALE: Has any complaint been made as to the action of these Commissioners?

MR. BRYCE: That does not arise out of the Question on the Paper.

Irish Exports and Imports.

MR. O'MARA (Kilkenny, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will consider the advisability of issuing monthly Reports of Irish exports and imports as are issued by the Board of Trade for the United Kingdom, or similar to figures issued by all self-governed British Colonies.

MR. BRYCE: The monthly Returns referred to, which deal with foreign trade, are collected under statutory powers. No such powers exist in regard to the cross-channel trade, and the Department of Agriculture necessarily depends for its statistics in this respect upon information voluntarily supplied. In these circumstances, it is feared that it would be useless to attempt to issue monthly Returns.

Inquiry into the Irish Fishing Industry.

Mr. FLYNN (Cork County, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland in reference to the appointment of the Committee of Inquiry into the working of the Department of Agriculture in Ireland, whether in view of the admitted necessity for the development of the Irish fishing industry, he will add to the Committee some gentleman of practical knowledge and experience of the capture and curing of deep sea fish.

Mr. BRYCE: I understand that Mr. Micks, a member of the Committee, was for some years secretary of the Congested Districts Board, and as such had administrative experience of the Board's fishery operations. Mr. Mick's knowledge, added to that which the Committee will obtain by evidence, will, in my opinion, be sufficient to enable them to deal with any question belonging to that part of the Department's work which may come before them.

Mr. FLYNN: Has any one on the Committee practical acquaintance with the important work of fish curing?

Mr. BRYCE: I do not know, but it would be difficult to have on a limited Committee of that sort persons familiar with every branch of the industry.

Value of Irish Live Stock.

Mr. O'MARA: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the estimated value of live stock, cattle, horses, pigs, sheep, etc., in Ireland on December 31st, 1905; and whether he will state the total value of live stock exported in the twelve months ending December 31st, 1905.

Mr. BRYCE: The total value of live stock in Ireland on the date mentioned is estimated by the Department of Agriculture at sixty-nine millions sterling, and the total value of live stock exported from Ireland during the year 1905 is estimated at thirteen-and-quarter millions sterling.

Irish Light Railways—Public Charges.

Mr. O'MARA: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the total amount levied by local boards to provide operating expenses and interest of capital in connection with railways built since 1887, under the Light Railways Acts.

Mr. BRYCE: The Local Government Board are not in possession of the information asked for, and could only obtain it by application to the local authorities. I am, moreover, informed that it is doubtful whether the present local authorities could in all cases furnish information of the expenditure prior to 1899, when they came into being.

Value of Irish Imports.

Mr. O'MARA: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the estimated total value of Irish imports in the year ending December 31st, 1905, under the following heads of food stuffs, raw materials, manufactured or partly manufactured articles respectively, and the estimated increase or decrease compared with 1904.

Mr. BRYCE: The Department of Agriculture are not yet in a position to form an estimate of the cross-channel trade for the year 1905, to which it is presumed that the Question refers. The foreign trade Returns are prepared by the Customs authorities, and are annually presented to Parliament.

Mr. O'MARA: Will the right hon. Gentleman take steps to expedite the getting of this information?

Mr. BRYCE: I have no doubt the Department will get it as early as possible. I will convey the hon. Member's wish to it.

Constable Anderson, Royal Irish Constabulary.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that three men, admittedly innocent, one of whom died, were tried, convicted, and sentenced to lengthened terms of imprisonment by the evidence of Sergeant Sheridan, Royal Irish Constabulary, who, with the aid of three perjured accomplices in the force, of whom one is Constable Anderson, brought home to them crimes of which he and his accomplices were the perpetrators, and received thereby promotion and pecuniary rewards, while a fourth man, also innocent of any crime, pleaded guilty to the charges of Sheridan and his accomplices and was sentenced to a lengthened term of imprisonment; whether he is aware that Sergeant Sheridan was dismissed from the force and allowed to leave the country without trial, while two of his accomplices were allowed to retire from the force, receiving gratuities of some hundreds of pounds sterling, paid to them as compassionate allowances, whilst Constable Anderson has been retained in the force; whether the Irish Government still intend to retain Constable Anderson in the police force in discharge of the duties and receipt of pay; for what reason has this man been retained in the force; why can he not be called on to resign, as in the cases of his two confederates, with a compassionate allowance; and whether, having regard to the circumstances, the Government will take any, and, if so, what, steps to rid the Irish constabulary force of Anderson.

Mr. BRYCE: I understand that the facts are substantially as stated in the hon. Member's Question. I fear that I am not in a position to add much to the reply which I gave him on the 7th instant.† As I then stated, this matter was repeatedly debated in this House while the late Government were in office. I find that on July 23rd, 1902, the right hon. Member for Dover stated that he had to choose between two calamities—keeping people in the force who ought not to be there, and breaking an undertaking which had been given by the Government; and, for the reasons he then stated, he decided upon the former course. The three constables who were Sheridan's accomplices were given the opportunity of resigning with the means of starting afresh as honest men. Two out of the three resigned and were given what has been described as compassionate allowances, amounting to £200 and £50, respectively. The third, Anderson, protested his innocence and refused to resign; and he has since been retained at the depot under the circumstances already described. The only question which His Majesty's Government have now to decide is whether they are to observe the undertaking given by the late Government, and my Answer must be in the affirmative. It is to be remembered that Constable Anderson performs no public duty, but is retained on "fatigue" duty at the depot, without any authority over recruits or other members of the force.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: Is not this man kept as a centre of pollution throughout the whole force? Does the right hon. Gentleman consider that the honour of the Government is bound by a corrupt bargain entered into by its predecessors? May I remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Duke of Bedford, as Lord-Lieutenant, refused to be bound by a corrupt bargain made by his predecessors with reference to the Act of Union? If the right hon. Gentleman is bound, what is the use of changing one Chief Secretary for another?

St. Patrick's Day—Closing of Licensed Premises in Ireland.

Mr. O'MARA: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state the percentage of licensed premises closed in consequence of pressure of public opinion on St. Patrick's day in Dublin, Belfast, Cork, Londonderry, Limerick, Waterford, Galway, and Kilkenny.

* Mr. BRYCE: I am informed by the Police authorities that the number of licensed premises wholly or partially closed on St Patrick's Day was as follows:—

In Dublin,	284	out of a total of	1242
„ Waterford,	93	„ „	218

Kilworth Evicted Tenant.

Mr. WILLIAM ABRAHAM (Cork County, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can say whether the Estates Commissioners have received an evicted tenant's form claiming to be reinstated signed by Patrick Myles, junior, to whom his father, Patrick Myles, senior, assigned his farm in 1900, previous to the eviction of the family in March, 1902; whether he is aware that the landlady, Mrs. Caroline Burke, Heclash, Fermoy, is not averse to reinstate Myles in his former holding of seventy acres, situated at Ballingaparka, Kilworth, county Cork; and whether, under the circumstances, the Estates Commissioners will intervene with a view to bring about a satisfactory arrangement.

*MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have received from Patrick Myles an application for re-instatement in his former holding on the estate referred to. The Commissioners approached the owner with the object of facilitating the reinstatement of the tenant, but her solicitors stated that she did not wish to part with her interest in the holding in question.

Irish Land Appeals.

MR. KILBRIDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can say how many cases were decided by the Court of Land Appeal, under the provisions of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1903, c. 37, s. 88.; in how many cases was inspection of the holding required by the tenant; in how many by the landlord; what was the average increase or reduction made in the rents fixed by the Sub-Commissioners in such cases respectively; and can he say what was the average increase or reduction made by the Court of Appeal in the rents fixed by the Sub-Commissioners in the cases in which appeals were heard and decided without such inspection being required by either landlord or tenant.

*MR. BRYCE: I am informed by the Land Commission that 10,131 cases under the provisions of the 88th Section of the Irish Land Act, 1903, have been disposed of by the Judicial Commissioners. Inspections of the holdings, usually by the direction of the Court, sometimes at the request of the landlord, and sometimes at that of the tenants, have been made in all such cases, with the exception of not more than twelve cases out of the whole number. It would not be possible, without going through the records of proceedings in all the cases to state in what number of cases the landlord and the tenant, respectively, applied for inspection. The particulars showing the results of rehearings and appeals, and the difference per cent. between rents fixed by the Sub-Commissions and the Civil Bill Courts, and the rents fixed after rehearings and appeals, appear annually in the Appendices to the Reports of the Land Commission. In the report for the year ending 31st March, 1905, these particulars are shown at pages 54 to 67.

Inspectors of Secondary Schools in Ireland.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the deadlock between the Intermediate Commissioners in Ireland and the Treasury as to the appointment of inspectors of secondary schools in Ireland; and, as this deadlock is injurious to education, whether he will use his influence with the Treasury to allow the views and judgment of the Intermediate Commissioners, who are all Irishmen, to prevail over those of the Treasury officials in this purely Irish question.

*MR. BRYCE: This matter has received, and will continue to receive, my careful attention. It has been decided that a permanent inspectorate shall not be established until the parts which inspection and examination should respectively play in the distribution of State aid to intermediate schools have been determined. I may remind the hon. Member that the recent Commission on Intermediate Education in Ireland expressed the opinion that a permanent inspectorate should not be appointed so long as the existing system upon which grants for intermediate education are administered remains unchanged.

Belleek Outrage.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a Methodist minister, returning from a religious service at Belleek, county Fermanagh, where he was one of the officiating clergy, was attacked outside the village of Garrison by four men with blackened faces, who threw him off his bicycle, which they smashed; whether the clergyman thus assaulted was a prominent worker for the radical candidate for North Fermanagh at the last general election; and whether the men who assaulted him, who were convicted and fined at the Belleek Petty Sessions, were all Orangemen; and what steps will the Government take to protect, from the violence of the members of the Orange lodges, persons of their own religion from whom they disagree on political questions.

MR. BRYCE: The police received information that on the night of 6th February, a number of persons were returning on cars from service in the Methodist Church at Belleek. Mr. Hindmarsh, a Methodist Lay Evangelist, who was riding a bicycle, accompanied the party. When about a mile from Belleek, stones were thrown at the party by four men, whose faces, however, were not blackened. One of the men barred Mr. Hindmarsh's way, and, as a result, Mr. Hindmarsh jumped from his bicycle and fell on the road. The four men then smashed the bicycle, but did no personal injury to Mr. Hindmarsh. The police prosecuted the offenders, one of whom gave evidence against the other three. Two of these were fined £1 each, and the other 5s. for assaulting Mr. Hindmarsh. They had already paid that gentleman the sum of £9 for the damage done to his bicycle and for costs. Mr. Hindmarsh himself informed the police that he was a stranger in the locality and had taken no part in the recent election. His assailants, according to the information of the police, are not Orangemen. I am informed by the inspector-general that the excitement which attended the recent contested election has now abated, and that no special police action appears to be necessary. Whenever protection becomes necessary against violence from any quarter it is the duty of the police to afford it.

Aglish Outrage.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the house of Michael Allen, at Aglish, Killarney, was entered by a band of disguised and armed men, and a gun and other articles taken; and whether the police have made any arrests in connection with this matter.

MR. BRYCE: I am informed by the police authorities that a complaint to the effect stated has been made to the local police, but it was not alleged that any article except a gun was taken. The police have fully investigated the matter, but have not so far obtained sufficient evidence to justify them in making any arrests.

MR. FLAVIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that at the last Assize the Judge congratulated the Grand Jury on the peaceable condition of this country?

MR. BRYCE: I believe that is so.

Rehy Rabbit Preserve.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on the 10th instant a band of upwards of 200 men and boys, with dogs and sticks and spades, entered the farm of John Fitzgerald at Rehy, Carrigaholt, county Clare, which he uses for breeding and feeding rabbits, and, after killing as many rabbits as they could, dug up all the burrows they could find; and what steps, if any, are being taken to deal with actions of this nature.

MR. BRYCE: I am informed that Fitzgerald is not the occupier of the farm in question, which forms part of the estate of Major Hickman, now being sold to the tenants. The farm was until recently used by the landlord as a rabbit preserve, but as the sale to the tenants included the sporting rights, the landlord has, I am informed, abandoned the use of this farm as a game preserve. Upon several occasions during the present month about a hundred men and boys have assembled on the farm to kill rabbits without objection from Fitzgerald, who was the former gamekeeper, or, so far as I know, from anyone else. No interference on the part of the police has been called for.

Dromagh Evicted Tenants.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to the estate of W.N. Leader, Dromagh, county Cork, and the correspondence which has passed between the Reverend Father Casey, P.P., and the hon. Member for North Cork, on the one hand, and the Estates Commissioners on the other, will the Commissioners now state what steps they have taken to bring about the reinstatement of the evicted tenants, Mr. Job

Fitzpatrick and Mrs. Mary Cronin (to the reinstatement of whom the landlord has given consent); and, in view of this landlord's willingness to sell a large portion of the untenanted land in his possession, and of the fact that the originating notice was lodged by the owner in June, 1905, will the Commissioners take immediate steps to secure this land for the purpose of creating suitable holdings for other evicted tenants, and for the labourers of the locality, and for the enlargement of the present uneconomic holdings on the estate.

Mr. BRYCE: I beg to refer to my reply to the hon. Member's Question of the 26th February on this subject.† The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have not yet been able to make inquiries into the cases of these evicted tenants, but that they hope to be in a position to do so shortly.

Mr. FLYNN: This matter has been going on a long time. Will the Land Commissioners make the inquiries soon?

Mr. BRYCE: I have no doubt they will do so as soon as they can.

Newman Estate, Mallow.

Mr. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to the Newman estate, Mallow, whether he can say under what section of the Land Act of 1903, or by what regulation of the Lord-Lieutenant under the said Act, the Estates Commissioners claim the right or discretion to exclude from the purchase scheme of this estate the tenant, Mr. T. C. O'Callagham, although he offered to purchase upon the same terms as the other tenant purchasers; and, having regard to the fact that this man was an industrious improving farmer, holding under a judicial tenancy, and has now been evicted, will the Commissioners retain in their own hands the corpus of the purchase money and the bonus, or take other steps to reinstate this man and place him in the same position as the other purchasing tenants on the estate.

Mr. BRYCE: I am informed by the Estates Commissioners that the holding referred to was excluded from the purchase proceedings in pursuance of the powers given to the Commissioners by Section 98 of the Act of 1903, which provides that the expression "estate" shall mean any lands which the Estates Commissioners may declare fit to be regarded as a separate estate for the purposes of the Act. The Commissioners are now in communication with the vendor on the subject of the eviction of O'Callaghan, and while those communications are in progress they are not in a position to make any statement upon the concluding part of the Question.

Mr. FLYNN: This case is one of very great importance to the district.

Irish Prison Governors.

Mr. MEEHAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will say what were the grounds on which five ex-military men, some of whom hold pensions from the Crown, have been appointed to the governorship of Irish prisons; what training and experience have these five gentleman, recently appointed over the heads of the prison service, had to qualify them for the positions; and will this system of depriving the staff of the prospect of promotion be persisted in.

Mr. BRYCE: I beg to refer to the very full reply which I gave to the hon. Member's Question of the 12th instant on this subject.‡ Only one recent appointment of the kind referred to has been made. Prison governors are appointed by the Lord-Lieutenant, whose function it is to satisfy himself that the gentlemen to be appointed possess the necessary qualifications. I have already stated that the proportion of promotions to governorships from subordinate ranks of the prison service is exceptionally large in Ireland, eleven out of the existing eighteen governors having been so promoted. There is no intention of departing from the present system, under which the claims of subordinate ranks to promotion have been fully recognised.

Police Protection in County Limerick.

Mr. CHARLES CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that there are sixteen persons in county Limerick who are under constant police protection; and whether he can say what are the causes which necessitate police protection in so many cases.

---

† See (4) Debates, clii., 796.

Mr. BRYCE: I am informed by the police authorities that there are only two persons under constant police protection in county Limerick, and that each of these persons is the caretaker of an evicted farm. There are, however, fourteen other persons who receive, not constant, but occasional police protection by patrols. The need has usually arisen from agrarian disputes.

Mr. LUNDON (Limerick, E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Judges of Assize and the County Court Judge have lately pronounced Limerick to be one of the most peaceable districts of Ireland, and that frequently during the last five years they have been presented with white gloves because there have been no prisoners for trial.

Mr. BRYCE: I think that is so.

Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL asked if the Question was in order, and whether, as framed, it did not make the hon. Member putting it responsible for the facts? Was it right that bogus charges should be put on the Paper in this way?

*Mr. SPEAKER: I do not see anything in the form of the hon. Member's Question to object to.

Queen's County and Canadian Cattle Imports.

Mr. MEEHAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Resolutions were passed by the County Council, Queen's County, the County Committee of Agricultural and Technical Instruction, the Slievemargy and Ossory Agricultural Societies in the same county, protesting against the withdrawal of the prohibition against the importation of Canadian store cattle, on the grounds that it would be ruinous to the interests of small farmers, and almost certain to introduce cattle disease to the country; and will he say whether the prohibition will be withdrawn; and if, so, on what date.

Mr. BRYCE: The Department of Agriculture have received Resolutions to the effect indicated in the Question. The prohibition referred to is imposed by statute.

Agrarian Disturbances in County Galway.

Mr. CHARLES CRAIG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether since 1st June last, in county Galway, there have been four cases of knocking down walls and gates, eight cases of intimidating letters and notices, four cases of agrarian assaults, eighteen cases of intimidation, other than by letters and notices, eleven cases of shooting into houses, two cases of shooting at persons, and one case of malicious injury to animals; and whether he proposes to take any action in the matter.

Mr. BRYCE: I am informed by the police authorities that since the 1st June last there have been in county Galway four cases of malicious injury to walls or gates, in three of which the injury done was trifling; twenty-two cases of intimidation by threatening letters or notices; two cases of assault, which might possibly have arisen from agrarian matters, though this is not certain; one case of intimidation other than by threatening letters or notices; ten cases of firing shots into houses; one case of firing at the person; and one case of malicious injury to animals. In one of the cases of alleged agrarian assault the Grand Jury threw out the bill against the accused, and in the case of firing at the person the accused were acquitted at Assizes. I am informed that county Galway was in an unsatisfactory state last year owing chiefly to an agitation in the early summer against the grazing system, but that the condition of affairs has decidedly improved since then, and that there is every reason to hope that this improvement will continue.

Gilford Township and the Banbridge Union Rates.

Mr. LIDDELL (Down, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the ratepayers in the township of Gilford, county Down, for years past, besides having to pay their share of the rates for the union of Banbridge, from which the rural school attendance officer is paid his salary, have had to pay a special addition to the town rates for the purpose of paying a town school attendance officer, and that notwithstanding that the said ratepayers have been paying two different rates to two different men for doing the same work neither of these school attendance officers has done anything in the matter of looking after the attendance of children within the township for over eight months; and whether he will take steps to secure that in future these ratepayers shall be responsible for rates to pay only one officer, whether urban or rural, and that that officer shall attend to his business better than such business has been attended to in the past.

*Mr. BRYCE: The Local Government Board understand that the facts are substantially as stated in the first part of the Question. The difficulty has arisen owing to an over-lapping of areas under the Irish Education Act, 1892, and a remedy could only be provided by legislation. I am, however, informed that for the past nine months the Gilford Town Commissioners have ceased to employ a school attendance officer, and the difficulty has therefore been obviated for the time being. The question as to the performance of his duties by the school attendance officer of the Banbridge rural district is one for the District Council to deal with.

Annesley and Downshire Estates.

Mr. MACVEAGH (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the fact that the lay Sub-Commissioner has recently, in several second-term applications by tenants on the estates of Earl Annesley and the Marquess of Downshire, county Down, confirmed the first judicial rents, and has in other cases granted only nominal reductions below the scale voluntarily proposed by the landlords; what reason, if any, the Sub-Commissioner gives for fixing a higher acreable rent on these estates than was assessed by former Sub-Commissions; whether he is aware that in consequence of the Sub-Commissioner's conduct the landlords concerned have withdrawn the scale of voluntary reductions heretofore offered to the tenants on executing second-term judicial agreements; and whether the attention of the Chief Land Commission will be called to this matter.

*Mr. BRYCE: The Land Commission inform me that during the period which has elapsed since the passing of the Act of 1903, eighty-seven second-term rents have been judicially fixed by the Sub-Commission Courts on the estate of the Earl of Annesley. In seven of these cases the second-term rents are the same as the first-term rents, and in eighty the first-term rents have been reduced. The total average reduction in respect of the eighty-seven cases represents 18·2 per cent. During the same period 427 second-term rents were fixed on the estate of the Marquess of Downshire. In one case the second-term rent is the same as that fixed for the first-term. In 426 cases the first-term rents were reduced. The average percentage of the reduction is the same as in the case of the Annesley estate. The Commissioners consider that they ought not to discuss the judicial decision of the Sub-Commission Courts in any particular case, and, moreover, appeals are pending in some of the cases referred to. Agreements fixing fair rents entered into in accordance with the provisions of Section 8, Sub-section 6, of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, during the period mentioned, have been received by the Land Commission in respect of the estates in question, namely, 410 from the Annesley estate, and 1,976 from the Downshire estate. The reduction as between the first and second-term rents represents 14·1 and 15·5 per cent. respectively.

Mr. MACVEAGH: Is it the case that landlords are withdrawing the scales of voluntary reductions heretofore offered to the tenants? On what basis do the Sub-Commission fix the rents higher than the landlords are willing to agree to?

*Mr. BRYCE: I cannot go into the question of the reasons actuating the Commission.

Seed Potato Loans.

Mr. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what amount has been lent by the Board of Works to boards of guardians in Ireland, since December, 1904, for the purpose of providing seed potatoes; and how many Poor Law guardians have availed themselves of this provision to obtain seed intended for the relief of distress from the Poor Law

Boards of which they were members, and so became disqualified from acting as guardians and liable to penalties for so doing.

Mr. BRYCE: Loans amounting to £70,017 13s. 2d. have been made since December, 1904, to boards of guardians for the purchase of seed potatoes. A table giving particulars of these loans will be found at pages 376–7 of the Annual Report of the Local Government Board for 1904–5. The board are unable to state how many guardians availed themselves of the means of obtaining a supply of imported seed, but as all persons rated under £15 were eligible, it is believed that a considerable number of guardians did so. The primary object of the seed supply operations was, not to relieve distress, but, there having been a partial failure of the potato crop, to introduce new varieties of seed and thereby to improve the crop.

Mr. LONSDALE: Are not the guardians who thus acted disqualified?

Mr. BRYCE: According to a recent decision they are, but it was not known at the time.

Mr. T. L. CORBETT (Down, N.): Has any action been taken in the matter?

Mr. BRYCE: It is hardly a topic which can be dealt with by Question and Answer. If the Question is raised on the Estimates, I will give fuller information.

Royal University and Disloyal Demonstration by Students.

Mr. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table of the House copies of the Minutes of Proceedings in the Senate of the Royal University relating to the exhibition of disloyalty by students at the last conferment of degrees, and the powers of the Senate for dealing with such matters, together with the correspondence which has passed between the Irish Government and the Senate upon this subject since October last.

Mr. BRYCE: I have referred this Question to the Secretaries of the Royal University in order to ascertain whether there would be any objection on the part of the Senate to the publication of the minutes of proceedings referred to, and I am informed that the matter will be laid before the Senate for consideration at its next meeting in May. In the meantime it will be premature to consider the question of publishing the correspondence referred to in the latter part of the Question.

The University Question.

Mr. LONSDALE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he has received a copy of resolutions passed by the Royal University Graduates' Association, protesting against any settlement of the university question involving the expenditure of State money upon ecclesiastical or sectarian institutions; and whether, in formulating proposals on this subject, regard will be had to this principle.

Mr. BRYCE: The Answer to the first inquiry is in the affirmative. I am not at present prepared to make any statement on the subject.

Countess of Kingston's Mitchelstown Estate.

Mr. WILLIAM ABRAHAM: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have considered the memorial presented to them in 1904 from persons holding property as tenants in Mitchelstown regarding inclusion of the town in the sale of the agricultural portions of the estate of the Countess of Kingston; and if this matter will receive the attention of the Commissioners when the estate is being inspected during the present month.

Mr. BRYCE: I am informed by the Estates Commissioners that they have received the memorial in question. The town of Mitchelstown is not included in the estate proposed to be sold. The memorial will be referred to the inspector for enquiry and report when he visits the estate.

Gough Estate, Gort.

Mr. DUFFY (Galway, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any representation has been made to the Estates Commissioners by Lord Gough, in respect to the sale to the occupying tenants of their holdings on the Gough estate in and near Gort; and, if not, in view of the proceedings instituted from time to time against the tenants, leading to disorder, seizures, and disturbance, he will consider with the Estates Commissioners the propriety of communicating with Viscount Gough, with a view to arranging terms of purchase.

MR. BRYCE: The Estates Commissioners inform me that no proceedings in regard to the sale of Lord Gough's Estate have come before them. The Commissioners will consider whether the circumstances of the case justify their taking any action in the matter under the recent regulations.

Athy Postal Accommodation.

MR. KILBRIDE: I beg to ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that dissatisfaction prevails in Athy, county Kildare, with the inadequate accommodation provided both for the public and staff in the present post office premises; can he say what length of time has elapsed since the post office authorities advertised for a site on which to erect a suitable structure; how many replies have been received, and when, offering suitable sites; whether he is aware that inconvenience has arisen owing to the delay in making choice of a site; and can he say when a decision will be arrived at.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: The unsuitability of the post office accommodation in Athy is recognised, and advertisements for a site for a new office were issued about two years ago. No offers were received at the time, but three have since been received, and are under consideration. I hope it will be possible to come to a decision in the matter very shortly.

Devolution in Ireland.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): I beg to ask the Leader of the House whether the official correspondence between the late Prime Minister and the late Viceroy of Ireland on the question of devolution is in possession of the present Government, and whether it will be produced.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs): I cannot answer that Question without inquiry and investigation. I imagine it would not be left in the archives, but I do not know. If the hon. Gentleman will give notice I will inquire.

MR. JOHN REDMOND said he would give notice.

Allotted Days of Supply.

MR. VICTOR CAVENDISH (Derbyshire, W.) asked if Report of a Naval Supplementary Vote having been taken on Monday that day could be counted as an allotted day in Supply.

*MR. SPEAKER said a Vote for £100 as a Supplementary Navy Estimate was taken on Report. The Standing Order with regard to Supply contained the words—"provided it is occupied with the consideration of the question shall not be included in the computation of the twenty days aforesaid." Properly speaking, the Vote ought not to have been taken, but his attention was not directed to it at the time or it probably would not have been taken. It could hardly be said, however, that the House was occupied by consideration of such an Estimate, for it only took a couple of minutes, and as the matter was a very small one and no substantial injustice had been done he saw no reason why Monday should not be counted as an allotted day.

CONTEMPT OF COURT (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Second Reading upon Friday, May 4th, read, and discharged. Bill withdrawn.

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

First Report brought up, and read; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

NEW BILL.

ALIENS BILL.

"To amend The Aliens Act, 1905, presented by Mr. O'Grady; to be read a second time upon Tuesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 115.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I propose to move as an Amendment to leave out the words after "that," and insert—"this House declines to proceed with the Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill without an assurance from His Majesty's Government that they will recommend the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire and report on the economic and moral effect of the system of indentured labour at present in operation in the Transvaal." I do not suppose, as at present advised, that it will be necessary to carry that Amendment to a division; but the object of moving it is the convenience of the House in order that the subject under discussion may be clearly defined and not interrupted by other subjects which would be relevant to the Second Reading of the Bill. I do not propose this afternoon to refer again to the old question of our grievance in regard to the misrepresentations which were made on the subject during the general election. The Government have by the mouths of its members acknowledged and regretted the misrepresentations, but have nevertheless largely profited by them. On the other hand, we have suffered, and may perhaps justly feel that it is no use crying over spilt milk. But I think there will be among Members on both sides of the House a feeling that the present situation of this most important question deserves further attention on the part of the House. We have heard varying—I might almost say inconsistent — expressions of opinion from members of His Majesty's Government, and I cannot help thinking that these declarations must have opened the eyes of many members of the Government to the very serious character of the proposals which they have under consideration. They have discovered in the course of discussions on this subject, in the first place, that the prosperity of the whole of South Africa is concerned, and any action they may take may bring bring about most grievous disaster, and we find also, incidentally at any rate, a great constitutional question of our relations with self-governing colonies brought before the House. The general question of the desirability or otherwise of Chinese labour may be discussed under two heads—there is the economic question and there is the moral question. I do not pretend to decide the relative importance of these two heads, but I deal first with the economic question. I may say that my case, to put it briefly, is that on either of these important branches the House, the country, and the Government have not sufficient information. Now as regards the economic question, it is admitted, it has formed the staple of one the speeches of the Under-Secretary for the Colonies, that the cessation of the system now in operation, and, indeed, as I understand, the cessation at any time, without any alternative being provided, would be productive of most serious consequences. It is admitted that the gold mines are, and must remain, probably for many years, the principal industry of the Transvaal, and as the principal industry of the Transvaal they are the pivot upon which the whole of the prosperity of South Africa depends. I do not think I need emphasise that. The noble Earl the Secretary of State for the Colonies—and if I may venture to say, though I differ from many parts of it—in a remarkably statesmanlike speech on the subject, declared that it was generally agreed that the success of the gold mines was indissolubly connected with the prosperity of South Africa; and I venture to say, and I hope to show, that a great deal more than this prosperity depends on the condition. If the mines are closed, if the richest mines are closed, which we are told is likely to be the case, in the first place many thousands of British workmen will be thrown out of employment, and sent home to increase the number of unemployed, already great, that exists here. But that is not all. If the miners go, British influence goes with them. Now, whatever we may think of the nature of the future Constitution to be granted to the Transvaal, we shall all agree with that great principle laid down by Lord Durham in his celebrated letter, that the foundations of a British self-governing Colony must be laid in British influence—that is to say, that, generally speaking, the country must be governed according to British ideas and not according to the ideas of a foreign nation. The House will see that, if we take from the Transvaal a very large proportion of those who are animated by these British ideas, who are nevertheless not tied to the soil, but may come away if their industry suffers or is lacking in development—that if you allow this to happen you will remove from the Transvaal a large proportion of those on whom we must depend in the future to maintain the British flag, British influence, and British ideas. Again, imports, not to the Transvaal alone, but to South Africa, at the present time are British imports, and, of course, exports from Great Britain supply the needs of the Transvaal and South Africa and give employment to a large number of British subjects at home. Destroy the position and the success of the mines and you destroy the prosperity of one of our best customers and influence unfavourably the condition of the working classes in this country. The exports from the Transvaal are principally, of course, gold and some diamonds, but as regards gold I think all persons acquainted with the subject will tell you that if anything occurs to stop the export it must have a serious effect on the finances of this country, and probably on the finances of the whole world. It is not a question—at least, it is not a question I am taking into consideration—of the profits of mine-owners or even of shareholders. I am taking into account the general economic effect of such a change as may follow the cessation of Chinese indentured labour. I think the reduction in the production of the circulating medium that will result from the abandonment of a great number of mines would be of the most serious consequence to the trade of the Empire. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is sanguine as to the results of his coming Budget; but I think he would have little upon which to congratulate himself if there were any serious reduction of these exports. Now, up to the present I do not think I have said anything with which the Government, at all events, will disagree. ["Oh! Oh!"] Well, let the Government speak for themselves. I have not said more, I am confident, than the Government have in substance already said. In the first speech made by the Under-Secretary for the Colonies he brought before the House very much the same arguments as those I have restated in giving reasons why there should be no premature action on the part of the Government, and the position they have defended is that we should look, not merely at the continuance of the present system; that we should allow contracts to be completed which have been entered into with some 16,000 or 20,000 Chinamen for labour in South Africa; that we should in effect give a period variously estimated, but four years at least, and, as we think, an even longer time, during which there would be a gradual abolition, but that no sudden, no violent action for discontinuance should be taken during that period. Now, I submit to the Government that an arrangement of this kind, which is a compromise, is, like a great many compromises, thoroughly unsatisfactory, whatever view is taken. It is unsatisfactory, absolutely unsatisfactory, to the industry concerned. If it should be shown—I do not prejudge the question—if no alternative is offered, that Chinese labour is necessary for the working of the mines to their fullest extent, then what advantage do you confer on the promoters of this industry by holding over their heads this sword of Damocles for four or six years? Is that the way a great industry, the chief industry of a country, can be maintained and developed? I appeal without distinction of party, is there a business man in the House—[Laughter.] The sense of humour in this House is something I have never seen before, and I confess I never knew a great Party so easily amused upon such small occasion. I appeal to men of business and ask them whether they can conceive that any industry can be successfully conducted and properly developed over which there hangs the threat of early extinction? I take an illustration known to all the House—that of sugar refining in this country and the manufacture of sugar refining machinery. Whatever you may think of the Sugar Convention, you must admit that sugar refining in this country and the manufacture of sugar refining machinery were practically destroyed by the uncertainty which prevailed. It was not so much the actual bounty which was given at any time, although that was very serious as a preference, but much more than that was the constant fear that that bounty might be altered to the disadvantage of the trade, and no man in his senses would employ his capital in an industry which was subject to anything of that sort. As it was in the sugar refining industry, so it must necessarily be in the mining industry. It is all very well to suggest, as some have suggested, that the mineowners have stopped their orders for machinery in this country in order to mark their indignation at the conduct of the Government or the House. The mineowners, like other business people, look first to their own interests and their own property, without regard to politics or anything of that sort. It follows that if they have stopped their orders for machinery, or are going to stop their orders, it will not be in order to spite the Government, but it will be because the conditions make it impossible to continue. I urge, and this is one of my claims on the common sense of the House, that, whatever is done in this matter, it should be done quickly, that the policy of the Government should be known to all the world, so that, at all events, those who are immediately and profoundly concerned may be informed upon it and may not remain in any uncertainty, for uncertainty is the very worst thing for trade. [MINISTERIAL cheers.] I again congratulate myself that I may carry with me the majority of the House. I think the Government feel that the fear of action which is to be taken four, six, eight, or ten years hence hanging over this industry is a very undesirable thing; and, therefore, while they are in favour of an abolition of the existing system, they are good enough to provide it with their idea of a substitute, and they tell us that this disaster, which we say would result from the absence of Chinese labour if there is no other labour to be found, need not be feared, because they know there are substitutes which really, if they only were aware of their own interests, must be more advantageous to the mineowners than the present system. What are those alternatives which have been suggested by the Under-Secretary for the Colonies? In the first place, he takes the view that cheap white labour might be substituted for the yet cheaper Chinese and native labour.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): I never said cheap white labour.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Really that interruption has no force. At any rate, the Under-Secretary knows enough of this matter to know that a higher-priced white labour is, in any circumstances, absolutely impossible. You may have higher-priced white labour for supervision, for the highest class of skilled labour, but nobody has suggested yet that the ordinary unskilled labour, the labour that is now performed by the Chinaman or the native, could be economically possible unless the white labour was to accept, not the same wages—I do not suggest that—but much more moderate wages.

MR. BYLES (Salford, N.): Unless the dividends are reduced.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: It is not a question of dividend. In the case of certain mines, the higher priced, the more valuable, the richer mines, there is no doubt that they might at the price of a reduction of the dividend, which already, remember, is included in the price in the market, so that any reduction now would be a great injustice to the present holders, whatever it might be to the original holders. But I grant the hon. Member that, if the House thought it fit to encourage and support a doctrine of that kind, there are certain mines which could well afford to pay a much larger wage by a reduction of dividend. That applies, however, to a very small proportion of the industry. The great proportion of the industry will be at all times a very poorly paying industry. No one can go into the lower grade mines with any expectation whatever that he is going to make his fortune—at all events as a pure investment. I am not talking of transactions on the Stock Exchange, to which are due almost entirely all the large fortunes of which we hear so much, but, treating it as an ordinary, normal industry, it is perfectly clear you can no more expect to make very large dividends or very large fortunes out of the lower grade mines than you can out of any large competing industry. Therefore, by adopting a policy which would lead to that result, I do not say you would close all the mines, but you would prevent development in the only way in which the trade can be developed in these low grade mines. The House knows that personally I am most favourable to the idea, nothing would please me more than to believe, that white labour at moderate wages could be employed in the place of these Asiatics or of the natives. But I am bound to remember this, that, when you come to discuss the matter with anybody who really knows practically anything about the business, you will find on one side Mr. Creswell, for whom, as I have already said, I have great respect, and, as far as I know, you will not find on the same side any single engineer of eminence. The engineering of the whole of Europe is represented on the Rand. There are, I believe, most distinguished German and French engineers. I know there are some of the finest engineers from the United States of America occupying the highest positions on the Rand, and, of course there are a proportionate number of British engineers, and I say that, as far as I know, there is not a single one of them who agrees with Mr. Creswell. I am not an engineer, and I am not competent to decide between them, although the Under-Secretary is; but, at least, it must be admitted that at present the balance of evidence is against the feasibility of employing white labour of the kind I am now speaking of upon these mines. The other day, the Under-Secretary, as an illustration of the position in which we are, spoke of the Ivanhoe mine in Western Australia, where the work is done entirely by white labour, and where the mine is very successfully managed. But, within the next day or so, the chairman of this mine wrote to say that, although that is true, he does not agree with the Under-Secretary. He does not think the conditions in the Transvaal are at all the same, and does not pretend to believe that the policy of the Ivanhoe mine could be safely pursued in the Transvaal. Surely under these circumstances, unless we think ourselves so wise that we can decide matters of engineering, matters of policy, matters of finance, matters of the most technical character, on our own sole wisdom, we ought to appeal to those who are recognised as scientific experts and witnesses upon the subject, and we should not enter upon what, after all, is a great experiment upon the unproved assertion of the Under-Secretary for the Colonies. The Under-Secretary went on to say that, in his opinion, sufficient effort had not been made by the mineowners to secure native labour. Are not the mineowners likely to know their own business as well as, or better than, the Under-Secretary for the Colonies? There native labour is cheaper. It is not open to the enormous objections which we all feel to Chinese labour. Do you suppose—I put that as an a priori argument—that they would not have employed native labour if they could have had it? [MINISTERIAL cries of "Yes."] There are so many Gentlemen in the present House who know everything. I do not agree. My argument is that if it was better for the mineowners and the industry to have native labour, and if native labour were procurable they might be trusted to have got it. They say that it is not procurable in sufficient quantities, and upon that I have a strong opinion, and I believe that they are right. Where is the native labour to come from? Long ago native labour in our British possessions was exhausted. While I was at the Colonial Office we did our very best, looking forward to the possibility that some demand for extraneous foreign Asiatic labour might be called for to promote the immigration and the importation of native labour. We tried to get it from Nyassaland, and, owing to a famine that caused terrible distress, the Foreign Office gave their assent, and I believe that the mineowners secured 2,000 or 3,000 labourers from that Colony. But there were the strongest protests made from the whites and from our own fellow-subjects in that Colony, who said that they were not prepared to denude the Colony of labour which would ultimately be required for its own development. Another illustration is Rhodesia, where they refused to allow, or to encourage at all events, the emigration of Rhodesian labour in order to supply the mines. In the Portuguese Colony, from which a great part of the native labour comes, they have already refused to grant permission in some parts of their territory, and I am certain that if the Portuguese become more energetic in regard to their Colonial enterprises or allow other nations to become more energetic, and to take a larger part in the industrial development of their own Colony they will, before many years, find that they cannot spare any of their labour for the British mines. Therefore, I am quite convinced that at the present time there is not enough labour, and that in the near future there will be less native labour. It is entirely a mistake to put before this House as a sufficient reason for getting rid of the Chinese that the mineowners have not taken proper steps to secure native labour.

MR. BYLES: Is it not a question of wages?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am much obliged for the interruption of the hon. Member, because it gives me an opportunity of dealing with that point, although it will prolong my speech. It has been said that wages are too low to attract the natives, and that if the mineowners could be persuaded to pay higher wages they would get all the native labour they want. That is exactly the reverse of practical experience on the Rand. The mineowners at present pay the natives a sum altogether beyond any normal expectation of remuneration which the natives had for their labour. It is probably double what the Boers used to pay for agricultural labourers, and the Boers complained most bitterly that the mineowners outbid them and that agriculture was at a standstill because the mineowners got the labour at a price which the Boer farmers could not afford to pay. The House must remember that human nature is not exactly the same in every quarter of the globe, and that when you come to deal with the human nature of natives in places such as we are considering, you find an altogether different order of ideas to deal with. To begin with, a native does not like work. At any rate, the native has not that real love of work which does exist amongst a great number of working men and others in different positions which makes them miserable if they are idle. That is not the case with the native. The native's idea, when he has got money, is to enjoy it. In fact, he would make a most excellent leisured class if you only provided him with the funds. Let me ask if the Under-Secretary for the Colonies has considered this question? We know how strong he is on the subject of morality. I wonder whether he has considered the state of things partly created by our employment of these natives, and does he consider it repugnant to morality? The native's idea of luxury is a wife—not one wife, but a number of wives, according to his means. Now these wives are not only wives, they are something more. But, after all, we tolerate polygamy in a great number of our dependencies, and I do not know why we should complain of it so much in the case of these native districts. But the wives exist in a state of semi-slavery. The more wives a native has, the more people he has to labour for him, and to allow him to enjoy his leisured existence. That is the condition of leisured existence. You cannot have it unless you have people to work for you. [Cheers.] I suppose that hon. Members who cheer do not altogether approve of that as a desirable state of things or a proper condition of social order. At all events, we are dealing with facts as they are. These natives, whatever you may think of them, are born in the belief that it is their right to be idle and to make their wives work for them. The more wages you give them, the more semi-slaves they will obtain. Incidentally, I said just now that the Boers complain of the high wages we pay the natives. I have talked to a good number of Boer farmers, and I do not think there was one who did not make a complaint because they did not get labourers. If you are to make, and I hope some day or other we shall make, the Transvaal and the Orange River Colony more important agricultural countries than they are at present, it can only be done if a sufficiency of labour can be provided; and I do not suppose that anybody suggests that whites should be employed as ordinary agricultural labourers on Boer farms. I do not think the Boers would accept them; they desire to have free access to a large supply of native labour, and if you are going to outbid them and take every native labourer into the mines, it will be a very serious matter. That has to be taken into account in connection with the introduction of foreign labour, which, at all events, relieves to a certain extent the pressure upon native labour. If that were not enough, in the same speech to which I have referred the Under-Secretary for the Colonies suggested that all these threats to a great industry would indirectly operate as a healthy stimulus to the mineowners to seek other alternatives, such as the introduction of labour-saving machinery. I think it is conceivable that labour-saving machinery might be introduced to a greater extent than at present. I am sure the mine-owners are quite alive to their own interests, and they would be only too glad to substitute labour-saving machinery for both native and white labour. But up to the present I believe no satisfactory machinery has been invented that will take the place of the natives and others who are employed in getting out the stuff in which the gold is found. In these circumstances I ask the House to come to the conclusion that we are asked to adopt a policy which must be taken to be a great experiment. If that experiment fails the injury we shall do to South Africa will be enormous, and we do not know enough of our own knowledge at the present time to say whether that experiment can succeed or will fail. The suggestions made to us by the Under-Secretary and other people are all hypotheses, and it is not safe to risk the security and prosperity of a great Colony —it is not fair to them, and it is not right in the interests of the Empire, to do this unless we have absolute knowledge. I claim from the Government, on no Party grounds, but on grounds of common-sense and reason, that they should agree to the suggestion which I made at the beginning of the session, that they should send out an expert Commission in which all the world, and British people especially, will have confidence in order to ascertain what are the true facts about these disputed matters. So much for the economic question.

Now about the moral question. Are the Government themselves agreed about this moral question? We have one Minister saying that this system is slavery, naked and unabashed; another Minister says it is semi-slavery; and another Minister says it has the taint of slavery. The last Minister, to whose opinion the greatest importance should be attached, because he is responsible for the situation in South Africa, the Secretary of State for the Colonies, says he declines all responsibility for these general statements, and deeply regrets that they have ever been made. After all, many hon. Gentlemen opposite feel very strongly upon this subject. Have they made up their minds? May I appeal to them to ask themselves upon what sufficient grounds they have made up their minds, upon what actually acquired knowledge they have come to this decision that it is slavery, naked and unabashed, or semi-slavery, or has the taint of slavery? I ask them, before they rush upon a proceeding which may involve this country in serious consequences, that they will convince themselves that for the opinions they have formed they have already sufficient knowledge, and that they will bear in mind that those whom they follow and support have not made up their minds, because it is perfectly clear from their utterances that they have arrived at different conclusions. Is it unreasonable of me to ask the Government to settle the question once for all? Why cannot they settle their own minds first? South Africa is not so very far away; the people speak the same language and have the same ideal. Why cannot we have evidence taken on the spot by people competent to judge the evidence, who would bring home to us the result of their inquiry, instead of depending upon those instinctive feelings of perfectly honourable but, I would say, perfectly ignorant people? What is the objection? It is not going to delay any important action by a single day. How long will the Commission take? Three months. Say six. Well, you are not going to deal with the thing for six or ten years. How will the Chinamen be benefited, how will morality be benefited by your acting in a sort of paroxysm of morality? Surely your action will be all the more effective, will be justified by the opinion of the civilised world, which is something, if you proceed on actual knowledge. It never will be justified if you act under the suspicion—I will not say that the suspicion is justified—that you are acting in order to cover up your tracks or to find an excuse for the statements you have made before the evidence was produced. We were horrified, and I think every humane man must have been horrified, by the statements which have been made continuously down to the present time of outrages by British subjects abroad upon the Chinese imported into the Transvaal. Well, are you not going to have any inquiry into that? I want to know whether these statements of outrages are true.

Mr. J. WARD (Stoke-on-Trent): Lord Selborne say yes.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Well, Lord Selborne admits certain abuses. There may have been abuses at the commencement of a new system, as there very often are; but Lord Selborne says that they are not continued. But if serious abuses have been alleged ought not we to satisfy ourselves by a more direct inquiry—an inquiry by a Commission would be more impartial than by any one holding the position of High Commissioner—ought not we to have some inquiry to assure us that these outrages ever did exist? Again, what harm can be done? Why are we to leave our fellow-subjects under the general imputation—because, remember, it is not an imputation that here and there some scoundrel or another has misused his temporary powers. I suppose we believe in parental responsibility and affection, and yet we know that the most horrible outrages on children are perpetrated by their own parents in Great Britain. Are we going therefore to condemn the whole civilisation and morality of Great Britain and place a stigma on its name because these outrages take place which everybody condemns? But cannot you place yourselves for one moment in the position of your British fellow-subjects abroad? Do you think that they do not feel these accusations when they are made in this general way, when there is no discrimination? Do you not think that they feel deeply your inability or unwillingness to discriminate between the wickedness of one or two and a general condemnation of the humanity almost of a nation, a nation of the same blood as ourselves? Now, I say again, why am I to be treated almost with contempt by the Prime Minister [cries of "Oh"]—why is it not reasonable to ask, if these outrages have been committed, that they shall be brought home to their authors and that those who have committed them shall, if it be humanly possible, be punished? And, on the other hand, that the nation at large shall, if possible, be relieved from a stigma that is perfectly discreditable? I have tried to think what can be the reason for the refusal of what seems to me to be such a reasonable request. I ask the Prime Minister, will he consider the matter? How are the Government going to suffer if they appoint this Commission, which I hope would be so constituted as to secure universal confidence? Let us take two hypotheses. They will report in one of two ways. If they report that there has been a mistake, that there is no outrage, and that there is absolutely no abuse in connection with the system, then are the Government afraid of the truth? They cannot be afraid of the truth, and if I might submit to their political sense this additional argument I would say, think of what a burden it would relieve them. If the country were convinced upon this impartial authority that they had been misled as to the existence of serious abuses in the Transvaal, then the Government would no longer be committed to a threatened diplomatic intervention in China, or to vetoing a self-governing Colony or to any other of the proceedings to which they apparently have committed themselves. They would then be justified in saying to the House and the country: "This is only an economic question; the question of morality is no longer concerned. We have an economic question to deal with, and that question we are going to leave to the absolutely unfettered discretion of the self-governing Colony we are creating." That is one alternative. I will take the other. Suppose they confirm all the worst anticipations of the gentlemen who, without hearing the evidence, have come to a conclusion; suppose that, after hearing the evidence, their instinct, their extraordinary keen perception of the wickedness of everybody else but themselves is justified, and it appears that what has been going on is really repugnant to humanity, see how strong the Government will be. Who is there, then, who will deny their right to interfere in those circumstances? They will have all the justification anybody can expect them to obtain. They can take strong steps. They can also have the advantage of the advice of the Commission they appoint, because they may instruct the Commission to report, if they find the state of things there unsatisfactory, their recommendations as to what steps should be taken for reform. It appears to me that from a political standpoint alone there is a very strong argument in favour of adopting this course. But look at the present situation. The Government are all at sea. They do not know in the first place what is the condition of things, and they do not know how they are going to relieve the possible conditions of things. They have shown that in their speeches. Read the speech of the Colonial Secretary in the House of Lords. Read the last speech of the Under-Secretary for the Colonies. Can anyone say that those two speeches are consistent, or even that the Under-Secretary is consistent with himself? Does anyone pretend that his last speech is consistent with his first speech? I take the last utterance of the Under-Secretary, and I ask the House to consider what is the position in which we are placed by our Government in face of a condition of things which they profess to believe is repugnant to morality and a stain on the honour of the British name. This is what they propose, unless I am misrepresenting them, which I will certainly not do if I can avoid it. They propose to postpone any drastic dealing with this subject for the present. They propose to leave it to a new Government to be established in the Transvaal which may not meet for a year or more. Now their first expectation and hope will be that when this Government meets it will be so animated by their own principles of morality that it will take exactly the same view as they do, and thereupon immediately get rid of the unclean thing. But that is a hope, an expectation; it is not a fact. The Under-Secretary himself showed in his last speech that they did not think it was probable. What will be the real opinion of the Transvaal? Though I do not generally predict, I venture to predict that they will not accept the views of the Government. They will not put a stop to Asiatic immigration, although they may alter in some details the Ordinances. [MINISTERIAL cheers.] Yes, but you can do that. You have already done it. You say that you have removed from the Ordinances the principal objections. Very well. I doubt very much whether any alteration made by the Transvaal Government will remove any objection held by the hon. Gentlemen who interrupt, but it may remove the objection to the economic working of the Ordinance. But I doubt whether it will be in the direction of sentimental or humanitarian views. [Cries of "Oh," and "What about the humanity of the Transvaal?"] Pretty defenders of the humanity of the Transvaal on the other side of the House. But as they have put a wrong meaning to what I have just said I will add this. My own conviction is that the members of the new Transvaal Government will think that the precautions already taken for the humane treatment of the Chinese immigrants are sufficient, and therefore such alterations as they may desire to make will be in regard to other matters in the Ordinance. I rest on statements made by the Under-Secretary. He does not think it probable. He has seen something of the Colonial Office, and he knows much more than hon. Members below the gangway. He thinks it very probable that they will not take the extreme view taken by the majority. Then what will he do? He will interfere in China and forbid British Consuls to carry out their part under the Convention. I wonder whether the law officers of the Crown have been consulted. I am not a lawyer, but it seems to me that the Convention of 1894 is an essential part of the Treaty of 1860, and that without the consent of both contracting parties no part of the Convention or of the Treaty can be abrogated or altered at our discretion. Has the hon. Gentleman satisfied himself by communicating with the Chinese Government that they would be glad to abrogate the Treaty of 1860? If he has assured himself of that assent, then I should ask him to produce the Papers in reference to this matter. It does seem to me that the proposal is illegal and a breach of treaty obligation. But, if this course were possible, the intervention of the Consuls is wholly to the advantage of the Chinese immigrants, and it is they who would suffer if the intervention of the Consuls were withdrawn. Even the Government feel that that is weak, but they say, "We have our great reserve. We will veto any legislation of a self-governing Colony which conflicts with our ideas of morality." That is the most serious thing that has yet been opened up in these debates. I see already that hon. Gentlemen are taking warning by the storm of indignation aroused in the Transvaal. It is brewing in the rest of South Africa, and unless the Colonies are very different from what I have found them it will spread to the other self-governing Colonies. They will never tolerate it. Who is that rush in where angels fear to tread? Hon. Gentlemen speak lightly of this; but remember that in the interpretation of your relations with the Colonies depends the continuance of your Empire beyond all question. It is funny to Gentlemen on the back benches on the Ministerial side, but it is a serious thing for everyone else who cares at all for the future of his country and the Empire. This statement by the Under-Secretary is treated by the Colonies as a menace to their liberties. What is it? It is the suggestion of a totally new form of government unknown to the Constitution. We know the Crown colony form of government. We know the different forms of Constitution which have been evolved out of the Crown colony. We know representative government and responsible government. But we have never known in recent years the extension of the right of veto which has been demanded by the Under-Secretary, which is to extend not to what have been understood as Imperial interests, but to questions of morality—questions not of any absolute ascertained principles of morality, but the morality which may be professed by a particular Party in a particular country at a particular time. I will quote your own great authority against you. The Lord Chancellor the other day was criticising the Lyttelton Constitution. He said that that—

> "Apparently was an attempt to make this country act as a kind of Providence to the people of the Transvaal instead of letting them govern themselves."

But what is this new Government doing? We are to be a Providence to the Transvaal for the purpose of looking after its morality, forsooth! It is impossible. Have Gentlemen opposite, I wonder, read a report of a letter by Sir Willem Van Hulsteyn, one of the most distinguished Afrikander lawyers in the Transvaal? He is a man who is entitled to have an opinion on a great constitutional question. He points out that Chinese labour does not fall into either of the two categories for which the Imperial veto is reserved by tradition—namely, questions affecting the rights of other British subjects or the relations of the Empire with foreign Powers. He shows the danger to the other self-governing Colonies of the precedent apparently contemplated by His Majesty's Government. He says—

> "If to-day they arrogate the right of rejecting by direct or indirect means our legislation on the subject of indentured labour, they may with equal justice claim the right to-morrow to reject any legislation in the self-governing Colonies which does not suit their notions of right and wrong. Nor would the precedent be less dangerous if it were assumed that a special standard of constitutional usage is to be set up for the particular benefit of the Transvaal. If we are not fit for self-government, then do not give it us. But the home Government have declared officially that we are fit for immediate self-government and that they intend to confer it. Yet at the same time they avow their intention of interference with our purely domestic concerns after self-government has been granted. I ask, What, then, is the status of a self-governing colony?"

If after full inquiry—for I will not contemplate any action which is not based on full inquiry—you have evidence that satisfies the House and the country that evil practices are going on in the Transvaal, and that it is your business to prevent them, then do not give them self-government until you are certain that these practices will not continue. If you are going to stop it, remember the position. At present the whole question is in your hands. You have Crown colony government of a very limited kind in the Transvaal. It would be very unwise now to interfere with them in a matter of this sort, one of purely domestic concern. But if you think otherwise, deal with the question now while you can, when no constitutional impediment can be raised against you. If to-morrow you say, "Chinese labour must cease," on constitutional grounds no complaint can be made against you. But it is a different thing to postpone your decision until you have created a self-governing colony with a limited liability whose morality you are going to supervise. What is our experience with our Crown colonies and with the greatest of all our dependencies, India? We interfere with India every day on economic questions.

I do not think the Secretary of State will contradict me when I say that if we gave self-government to India to-morrow, one of the first things they would do would be to impose a protective tariff. You do this in the case of Crown colonies. But I do not think the Secretary of State would like to introduce a Bill into this House to institute an inquiry as to whether certain practices in India are entirely consistent with our ideas of morality. Occasionally in the Crown colonies there is more or less evidence of practices, not uncommon in savage tribes and even in civilized countries whose ideas of morality differ from ours, which would not commend themselves to the morality of which we have heard so much. But even in a Crown colony or a dependency the less you say the better. Unless you are willing to incur the greatest danger, you will not inquire too closely whether the ideas of morality in this country—[MINISTERIAL cries of "Oh"]—I challenge you to inquire as to whether the ideas of morality which prevail in this country are exactly the same as the ideas which prevail in many British possessions. It is not our responsibility. Have we not admitted—and think where the admission carries you—that countries under the British flag have a right to their religion unrestricted, and even at times supported by the British Government? Are we not a great Mahomedan Power, and do not we tolerate religions compared with which that of Mahomed is a gospel of mercy, truth, and justice? And you cannot separate morality from religion. If you look after morality you will find you are trenching very closely on the confines of religion. What you already consent to in the case of religion you are obliged to do in the case of a great deal of what is called morality,

In conclusion, I will say that before you carry out your decision, even in respect of the steps which you have taken as a sort of preliminary to a more important interference, had you not better appoint this Commission, had we not better see whether the charges are well-founded? I have already reminded you that you are not risking anything by doing this, except, perhaps, the reversal of some cherished but erroneous conviction. If your views are confirmed you are losing nothing in the way of your ultimate action or time. Will the Government not be wise, then, and grant this Commission? Are they not unjust if they refuse it? Is it not wrong in a great Government which necessarily represents and is responsible for the Empire to allow charges of this kind to be brought and to be circulated and to be believed without any sufficient investigation? I asked the right hon. Gentleman a civil question a short time ago, but I received to the question nothing but a very curt answer. When I first proposed this inquiry at the opening of the Session I thought myself that the tone of the right hon. Gentleman was rather in favour of the inquiry for which I asked. In the interval something had occurred to change his mind. The position at the present moment is one of absolute refusal to an inquiry; but I say that you must desire to have the information so as to give the Government a basis on which they may safely proceed, and thus to avoid the greater part of those tremendous risks which I have endeavoured to bring before the House. I beg to move.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out from the word 'That,' to the end of the Question, and add the words 'this House declines to proceed with the Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill without an assurance from His Majesty's Government that they will recommend the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire and report on the economic and moral effects of the system of Indentured Labour at present in operation in the Transvaal.'"—(Mr. Chamberlain.)

*MR. CHURCHILL: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham asks us to decline to proceed with the consideration of the Consolidated Fund Bill until we have appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into the moral and economic effects of Chinese labour in South Africa. The right hon. Gentleman has disclosed his Amendment at the last possible minute, and therefore I hope that he will not think I desire to treat it with any disrespect or discourtesy by not giving him as full a reply on this question in all its branches as I should have wished to do to a right hon. Gentleman of his great position in the House. But the right hon. Gentleman in the course of his speech touched on many subjects which, I think, were hardly relevant to the proposal for the appointment of a Royal Commission. I do not intend to enter into a discussion of the technical details of how the labour supply of the Witwatersrand mines may be stimulated or expanded, nor do I think I should profitably detain the House by an examination of those various native customs which the right hon. Gentleman referred to, or by plunging into a somewhat perplexing dissertation on the different classes of morality with which the right hon. Gentleman regaled us towards the close of his remarks. The right hon. Gentleman has drawn for us a dark picture of the situation in South Africa and of the misdeeds of the Government, and of the dangers and disasters which he apprehends may follow from them. What is the right hon. Gentleman's remedy for all this? A Royal Commission. I admire that touching faith in the virtue and efficacy of Royal Commissions which the right hon. Gentleman has been able to preserve through his many years of Parliamentary life. For my part, having seen the utility and efficacy of Royal Commissions appointed under the late Administration, I observe that they were usually appointed with a desire to hang up a subject or to stifle a popular demand by battening it down under a mass of bulky Blue-books. I really think that the right hon. Gentleman before making this demand upon us for a sovereign remedy for all the evils of South Africa should have thought out clearly what is the sort of Royal Commission that he desired. It is, he says, to be a Commission to inquire into the moral and economic aspects of this question. I should have thought that, if it were desired to inquire into the economic aspects of this most complicated and technical question, it would have been probably desirable that the Commission should be appointed to consist principally of mining experts, of people who had great experience of the working of gold mines and also of native labour. But if, on the other hand, we are to inquire into the moral issues which now excite the concern of the right hon. Gentleman, I do not suppose that such a body would be specially well suited, whatever their technical qualifications, to investigate the moral aspects of the question. [An HON. MEMBER: Why not?] Is it then seriously contended that a Commission of mining experts should be appointed in order to investigate questions of morality? I submit that on the face of it the right hon. Gentleman would require, not one Commission, but two Commissions, to inquire into two sets of circumstances which are totally separate. Let me say, first of all, that His Majesty's Government remain of the opinion which was conveyed to the right hon. Gentleman by the Prime Minister, that no useful purpose would be served at this juncture by the appointment of such a Commission or Commissions as he suggests. We do not think that it would allay the anxiety and the uncertainty by which the South African situation is surrounded. We think also that, while the inquiry was being prosecuted, it would be possible that the unrest and disturbance might reach a height greater than will be attained if nothing of the sort is done. Taking first of all the Commission of mining experts, I am bound to say I do not believe that the investigations of such a Commission would alter the general position of this controversy. I do not think that a Commission of mining experts, if they arrived at conclusions favourable to Chinese labour, would appease many of the opponents of Chinese labour in South Africa, nor would they procure the general assent of South Africans to the system. I am quite sure that if such a Commission came to conclusions unfavourable to Chinese labour it would not convince the mine-owners, for it is said that they know their own business better than anyone else; and I am bound to say that I do not think the employers who are able to secure indefinite supplies of cheap labour will ever give them up merely because they are recommended to do so by the report of a Commission. It would be in conflict with the general policy of self-government as declared by the Government to institute such a Commission as this. If it reported before responsible government were given, and if this report were adverse to the system, it would throw the responsibility for immediate action on us. If, on the other hand, it reported after the grant of responsible government—as I should expect it most certainly would—the recommendation would clearly not decide the question. The question of Chinese labour would be fought out in the Transvaal Assembly on Party lines, and it would be certainly decided over the heads of any Commision, and without particular reference to any report which a Commission might make.

Now let me approach the other section of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. Would such a Commission remove the objections which, rightly or wrongly, but with perfect sincerity, are entertained in this country? Let us first of all take the question of outrages to which the right hon. Gentleman referred. Do we stand in need of any more information on this subject? [Cries of "Yes."] We have here in the Blue-book published at the beginning of this session Lord Selborne's account of his investigation of the charges which were made by Mr. Boland. Lord Selborne is clear in saying that these charges were exaggerated; but he is also perfectly clear in showing that there was a considerable foundation for them, and that improper and illegal practices prevailed to a very considerable extent and for a considerable time over a large portion of the Witwatersrand region. Lord Selborne says—

> "Now, it is not denied, and, indeed, I have already informed you, that prior to June, 1905, illegal corporal punishment, after trial by the mine authorities, was widely resorted to as a disciplinary measure on the mines of the Witwatersrand; and it cannot be disputed that, where administered, it was administered in the manner described in Mr. Boland's letter, i.e., in a manner borrowed from the practice of the Chinese Courts of Justice. I do not defend such proceedings, but I repeat what I have already stated, that I am convinced that they have entirely ceased since Mr. Jamieson's assumption of office as Superintendent of Foreign Labour."

And again—

> "Mr. Mackarness's letter is accompanied by a reproduction of a photograph of a Chinese coolie being punished by being made to wear what is termed in China the 'cangue.' Mr. Mackarness's description of this form of punishment is substantially accurate. I absolutely condemn its use, which is clearly illegal; but, as in the case of flogging, I am quite satisfied that this form of punishment has been wholly discontinued since June last."

I should have thought that this report, written on the authority of Lord Selborne, the Governor appointed by the late Government, would have satisfied hon. Members opposite. Lord Selborne sat for a long time in the Cabinet with right hon. Gentlemen on the Bench opposite, and certainly no one would be more inclined, more eager, to free any British subject abroad from unwarrantable and unfair charges of this character than Lord Selborne. But with the utmost frankness and candour, and without the slightest exaggeration, Lord Selborne has thought it to be his duty to place on record an admission that such practices prevailed. Although I do not deny that a Commission rummaging about on the Witwatersrand from month to month might accumulate a larger body of evidence, I do not think that it would overthrow the conclusions to which Lord Selborne has come—conclusions which have justified the alterations which the Government have decided to make in the Ordinance, as well as the speeches which have been delivered in condemnation of the system as instituted by the late Government. But would it remove the other and wider objections? I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has ever properly comprehended the objections put forward on this side of the House to the use of Chinese labour. Perhaps some hon. Gentlemen may think that this is one of those unreal objections put forward for the purpose of assailing the political opponents of the Government; yet I should have thought that the spectacle of a white community consisting of no more than 120,000 adult males, proposing to erect itself permanently upon a foundation now of 60,000—I believe it was contemplated that the numbers would be very nearly doubled—imported labourers from the other end of the world, who are restricted to the lowest possible form of employment, who are prohibited from raising themselves by any skill which they may have in their trade, who are forced to live—these 60,000—in a state of unnatural celibacy, who are prohibited from residing, at the conclusion of their contract, in the country which their labours have enriched, I should have thought that that would have been considered by the right hon. Gentleman, with all his wide experience of human nature and life, as a somewhat unsatisfactory footing on which to build a State. That is not an objection which the Report of a Commission on the facts which indeed are not in dispute between us would remove. I have heard it said that the majority of highly educated people do not agree or sympathise with the views of the Liberal Party and of the democracy of this country upon the subject of Chinese labour. Well, Sir, I can quite understand that a man who works with his brain, however hard he works, cannot —unless he has a gift of imagination, the rarest and perhaps the best of all gifts— understand how this alliance, this conjunction between cosmopolitan capital and the immense unmeasured reservoirs of Asiatic cheap labour, how this strange conjunction which the improving civilisation of the world has, I think for the first time, rendered possible—I do not think it is easy, I say, for a man who works with his brain to understand how such a conjunction strikes the man who has nothing to sell but the sweat of his brow. I say the apprehension which is felt by the working masses in this country of such a system, such a conjunction, becoming permanent and extending in the future is well founded, for, if that were the case, it would strike a deadly blow at the under-pillars of European civilisation. That again is an objection which I do not think the Report of a Commission would be likely to remove. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham that uncertainty is bad for trade, and I only wish he had thought of it before. But a Royal Commission, which is his panacea for all evils—he is so fond of them that, when he cannot institute them under the authority of the Government, he institutes a private Commission of his own—would not terminate the uncertainty which prevails; it would only aggravate the uncertainty, because of the greater disturbance, heat, and partisanship which would be developed while it was engaged in its labour. There would still remain the uncertainty of the decision of the Transvaal Government. The right hon. Gentleman takes that for granted. He is quite certain that the Transvaal Assembly will not decide in favour of humanitarian views.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I did not say that. [MINISTERIAL and LABOUR cries of "You did."]

*MR. CHURCHILL: The right hon. Gentleman said that the people of the Transvaal were not able to share our sentimental or humanitarian views. The right hon. Gentleman assumes that the decision of the Transvaal Assembly will be in favour of a continuance of Chinese labour. We are not so certain of that.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: You said you thought it probable.

*MR. CHURCHILL: No, on the contrary; the right hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong. I put the two alternatives. The first alternative was that they decided against the continuance of Asiatic labour; then I said, in that case all would go well, and the policy which the Government have adopted would have been vindicated in a complete and convincing form. In the second alternative, I admit I sketched less rosy possibilities, but I expressed no opinion at all, in the second speech I made on this subject, as to which of those alternatives it was more likely that the Transvaal would adopt. In the first speech which I had the honour to address to the House of Commons on this question I distinctly said His Majesty's Government had every hope that the Transvaal Assembly will come to a decision with which His Majesty's Government may find themselves in agreement. But that uncertainty, whatever it is, would not be removed by the appointment of a Commission. Is not Chinese labour in itself rather an element of uncertainty. When I contemplate this great industry, upon which so much of the future of the Transvaal, upon which so much of the economic development of South Africa as a whole depends—when I contemplate that great industry, standing as it does upon a basis of speculative finance, and supplied from day to day by a stream of Chinese labour which is liable to interruption at any moment by the caprice of an Oriental ruler [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh, Oh."], I incline to think that of all the elements of uncertainty which have been introduced into the South African situation the element of Chinese labour is the most disturbing and the most dangerous. No one will dispute for a moment that the gold mines are the mainspring of the modern development of South Africa, and we shall all agree with the right hon. Gentleman in the great importance which he attaches to fostering the development of that industry and not unnecessarily hampering it. But if Chinese labour is of such importance, what a pity it is that the right hon. Gentleman treated it with such levity. Every one knows that in the debate on the Address the right hon. Gentleman attacked the policy of the Government, not on the ground that the Government were going too far in what they were doing against Chinese labour, but he endeavoured to excite censure against the Government on the part of their supporters by representing that they were not going far enough. [OPPOSITION cries of "No."] And he even allowed himself to say that he knew—how he knew I do not investigate—that the mineowners had been consulted on the policy and were perfectly satisfied. Now the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London has come back refreshed with the latest views of the Stock Exchange. [OPPOSITION cries of "Oh."] The right hon. Gentlemen the Member for West Birmingham is now what I believe he once called Lord Hartington, the "late" Leader of the Opposition, and now he has very obligingly entirely changed his position in regard to the policy of the Government upon Chinese labour. Just as before he endeavoured to inflame the feelings of some of the supporters of the Government who take the most extreme views upon this question by representing that they were not going far enough, so now he endeavours to inflame the feelings of the Colonies by representing that some fearful collision between the Colonies and the Mother Country upon the question of self-government is likely to occur. As the right hon. Gentleman has brought this question into the arena of our debates to-day, I must take the opportunity of saying that I do not believe that the course he has adopted in the discussion of the Chinese question has been a wholly patriotic course. The right hon. Gentleman has contracted deep obligations to this country in respect of South Africa. At his bidding, and on the faith of his instincts and foresight as a statesman, and by the force of the appeals he addressed to the House and the country, this nation and the Empire have made unparalleled sacrifices for South Africa. No sooner had the war come to an end, and while all the business of settlement was still upon hand, the right hon. Gentleman got tired of the South African situation, pushed it away from him as a toy which had ceased to amuse, and embarked at once upon another adventure which was as rash and as uncalculated as the first, and the only difference between the two was that, whereas the first enterprise of the right hon. Gentleman has had the effect of nearly ruining South Africa, the second enterprise has had the effect of politically ruining himself. His Majesty's Government are deeply conscious of the anxiety of the South African situation. We are not responsible for the repeated raising of these debates. We know how difficult and complex these questions are, how every word spoken by unpractised speakers is carried to Colonies concerned, and how it is very often represented there in the worst possible light. We know the tremendous ramifications of newspapers which support the right hon. Gentleman and which carry his words also to the Colonies concerned, and we know it is in his power, in Opposition though he be and with however insufficient a following behind him, to cause anxiety and doubt in the Colonies because of the great attention that is paid to everything he says.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: You said I was politically ruined.

*MR. CHURCHILL: The right hon. Gentleman may still retain some capacity for evil. Therefore, His Majesty's Government do regret the repeated raising of these debates, which are sprung upon us at a moment's notice, and which are pressed with insistence, in the hope, as I believe, that something may be said which will furnish further capital to the right hon. Gentleman and his supporters in the country. The policy of His Majesty's Government in regard to Chinese labour has been laid quite clearly before the House. We have redressed, and we are redressing, those features of the Ordinance which we consider unsatisfactory. We desire to leave the decision of the question to the Transvaal Assembly, which will be formed as soon as reasonably possible, having regard to the most important constitutional issues at stake. It is not proposed by the Government to exercise over the Transvaal, when it is a responsible self-governing Colony, any powers or restraints which are not now exercised, and which have not been frequently used, over every self-governing Colony of the Empire. The right hon. Gentleman told us that the self-governing Colonies would never tolerate the idea of the Imperial Government's being a party to the decision of questions which solely affected themselves. He said that they would never tolerate any interference by us in any action they might take with regard to Chinese labour. It is a curious thing that I was reading the other day in The Times the account of a case which occurred in Western Australia which bears on this very point. It seems that the Legislature of that Colony passed the Factory Bill of 1904, which, I gather, inadvertently received the sanction of Mr. Lyttelton as Colonial Secretary and became law. The Colonial Secretary seems to have imperfectly apprehended the character of the measure. It was an Act for restraining Chinamen, curiously enough, and other Asiatics from working long hours, which would make their competition injurious to white men. A prosecution was instituted under the Act against an employer whose Chinese labourers had worked longer hours than the Act permitted. The employer appealed to the High Court of Western Australia. The case for the appellant was based upon a reference to all these questions of constitutional morality upon Magna Charta, and all these principles of British freedom which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham mistakenly assumes are only honoured and respected in these islands. Mr. Justice Carter, a judge of the High Court of Western Australia, said, in summing upon this case—

> "The discussion which has taken place before us on the constitutional question has been very interesting, and I trust that at some future date this Court may have an opportunity of again hearing the arguments on this question, and of arriving at an opinion; and I trust that when that time does arise, we shall have a bench of at least three judges. I express no opinion, nor do I desire to express my opinion, upon the arguments which have been urged before us, but I will say this, that it seems to me that this Factories Act is the most extraordinary piece of legislation"

Mr. Churchill.

—I ask the House to mark this—

> "and I am astonished that objection was not taken to it by the Imperial authorities. Portions of it are apparently adopted from the Queensland and New Zealand Statutes, but apparently the most stringent clauses referring to the Chinese and Asiatic races in Western Australia are original."

Here, then, is a judge of the High Court of Western Australia expressing astonishment that the Imperial authorities had not more carefully examined colonial legislation which came to this country for approval. Yet the right hon. Gentleman tries to make out that we propose to embark upon a wholly new procedure in regard to colonial policy. One other quotation I will make. When the right hon. Gentleman was at the Colonial Office in 1897 he himself made a departure upon what he would have us believe is a totally new form of treating responsible self-governing Colonies; and the curious part of it is that the right hon. Gentleman did so upon those very grounds of morality which he now says ought never to be put forward as a cause for Imperial intervention. A Bill was passed by the Newfoundland Legislature which, it appears, would enable the Party in power to exercise very improper influence over the conduct of elections. The right hon. Gentleman, in the course of a letter which he authorised to be sent from the Colonial Office, expressed himself as follows—

> "The effect of the measure would be to enable the political Party, for the time being in power, to employ public funds for the purpose of corruptly securing themselves in office. Mr. Chamberlain hesitates to believe that it is the deliberate wish of Newfoundland electors that the public funds should be so employed, and feels that it would be impossible for him to advise Her Majesty to assent to such a measure in its present shape. He trusts, therefore, that you will take the earliest opportunity of bringing it again before the Legislature with a view to its further consideration and to the introduction of amendments."

And this is the new constitutional departure which, it is represented, we intend to make; this is the application of a new system of morals to our colonial policy. I need hardly say to the House of Commons that His Majesty's Government entertain a most sincere respect for those great traditions of self-government which have always been, and will always be, the guard-rails of Liberal colonial policy. We have no intention of going in the slightest degree beyond the powers which we properly possess; and having regard to the immense importance of these issues in South Africa no effort on our part will be neglected to promote the welfare of the great industry concerned, or to prevent any evil collision or deadlock arising between the Imperial Government and the Assembly which is about to be created in the Transvaal.

Now, I have done my best to reply to the points raised by the right hon. Gentleman in the course of his speech. I am sure it is not out of any desire to be discourteous to him that the Prime Minister has refused the Royal Commission. It is only because we think that so far from simplifying the difficulties and allaying the uncertainties it would rather aggravate them, without any compensating advantage that we are unable to accede to his wish. Let me say, in conclusion, that if we desired counsel and guidance in regard to this grave situation in South Africa, it is not to the right hon. Gentleman we should appeal, however great our difficulties might be, for we know that if we have to find some path that will lead us into a happier state of affairs than now prevails in South Africa, it will not be through any assistance we may receive from the patriots and Imperialists who sit on the opposite benches; but it will be in spite of every obstacle that perverted ingenuity, stimulated by resentment of defeat, can suggest to them.

*SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend) thought the speech of the Under-Secretary would do little to reassure those people in this country who did not think that the policy which was being pursued by His Majesty's Government at the present time was a wise or a safe one. He did not think the speech of the hon. Gentleman, though more careful in its terms and more vague and uncertain than usual, would do more than to incite a further demonstration against our fellow-countrymen in South Africa by the people in this country who, through sentiment or ignorance, were inclined to take what he might call the anti-colonial or anti-Imperial view. There was no use disguising the fact that there was a considerable body of people in the Liberal Party who did not believe in the Colonies, and they would receive encouragement from the speech of the Under-Secretary. What he had to say came from some knowledge of the country of which the hon. Gentleman had been speaking in such eloquent and rhetorical terms. The hon. Gentleman spoke of founding a State upon servile labour, and said that Oriental labour was an ill basis upon which to build up a State. That was to say that Oriental labour was the whole basis upon which to build up a State in the Transvaal. He would refer the hon. Member when he spoke of 60,000 Chinese in the Transvaal to the 60,000 Orientals in Natal.

MAJOR SEELY (Liverpool, Abercromby): They are citizens.

*SIR GILBERT PARKER asked what that had to do with it. The hon. Member for the Abercromby Division of Liverpool was a little too swift in his interruption. In Natal the prosperity of the Colony had been built up by black labour—native Kaffir labour, Zulu labour, and Indian labour. Did the hon. Member challenge the civilisation of Natal and the condition of its industries from either a moral or political point of view? Did they find in Natal any demonstration that the citizenship here was alone of that high standard which the hon. Gentleman represented so well in this country amongst his fellow-citizens? If we pursued that line of argument to its logical conclusion we should also have to rule Queensland out, because the civilisation of Queensland was built up by native and imported Polynesian labour. The hon. Member had spoken of the civilisation of the Transvaal being built up at the caprice of Oriental rulers. Such a phrase might have been expected from the pen of a clever journalist, but not from the mouth of the Minister to whom they looked to allay the anxiety now felt in the Transvaal as to what course the Government were going to take — an anxiety which his right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham well understood. The Royal Commission had been refused on two grounds; one, that it would be necessary to send out a combination of mining experts in order to appreciate their judgment. The hon. Gentleman repudiated the idea that those mining experts would have any authority to inquire into the moral aspects of the question, so that if a Royal Commission were to be sent out, the hon. Gentleman, he supposed, would choose for that purpose a deputation of the prevention of profanity league or some kindred association housed in Exeter Hall. He supposed the hon. Gentleman the Under-Secretary expected the Unionist Party and the Colonies to take his words seriously, and unfortunately his position was such that they were obliged to take them as the serious words of the Government. But when the hon. Gentleman presented to the House the reasons why a Royal Commission should not be sent to South Africa, he could not possibly think that all those who sat with the hon. Gentleman on the Government Benches were in accord with him, or that they would offer the same reasons for its refusal. The hon. Gentleman appeared to have the idea that the mining industry of the Transvaal could be carried on by white labour, and he had made some statement recently as to the comparative cost of production. But did the hon. Gentleman seriously think they could get cheap white labour in the mines there, and preserve the mining industry in the condition of prosperity in which it now was? Had the hon. Gentleman read the experience of Mr. Creswell, who showed that when 8s., 9s., and 10s. a week was paid for cheap white labour on the Village Reef mine, the wages paid to white skilled labour had to be reduced in order to pay such sums to the white unskilled labour? White unskilled labour could not live on 8s. and 9s. a day. The cost of bare living in the Transvaal was £16 a month. The experiment of cheap white labour in the Transvaal has been tried and had proved a failure, and if it were tried elsewhere the result would be the same. In order to insure that there should be 300 men always in the Village Main Reef mine a thousand were passed through Mr. Cresswell's hands in the course of six months. And the hon. Gentleman knew perfectly well that his expression of opinion with regard to cheap white labour was only meant to cover a difficult point in his political experience. These difficult points would become much more difficult if the kind of statements which the hon. Gentleman had made concerning the veto—made with more restraint to-day, he noticed—continued to be made. The instances the hon. Gentleman gave of his right hon. friend's so-called interference were ludicrous in the extreme. To give advice to the Transvaal on a matter not of great consequence to that colony was practical, but any interference with the judgment of the people of the colony would be disastrous. Let them presume that the Government of the Transvaal passed a Chinese Ordinance securing to the colony a continuance of Chinese labour, a thing which they believed to be absolutely necessary to preserve not only the gold industry, but every other industry in South Africa in order to give it its present condition of prosperity, and let them presume that by a veto of this Government they were prevented from carrying out that Ordinance. Did the hon. Member for the Abercromby Division think these people were of a different sort of make from ourselves, and that they would act differently from ourselves in the same position? Did the hon. Gentleman realise that these men, who represented the interests, industrial and commercial, in the Transvaal, were men of our own race, who had the same independence of thought, and who, if we in one way or another interfered in these affairs would resent in set terms any interference on our part to hamper or destroy the product of their own industry? He did not think there was any one who had any interest at all in the Transvaal who was not aware that in the Transvaal at the present time there was a most alarming state of uncertainty as to the action the Government would take. As the right hon. Member for West Birmingham had pointed out, uncertainty was bad for trade. He was not one of those who would willingly cripple the efforts of the Government in settling the Chinese difficulty, if they were only going to alter certain minor conditions of the Ordinances. He thought they could bear a good deal of recrimination if the alterations to be made made the conditions more oppressive so far as the mineowners were concerned and more lenient so far as the Chinese were concerned. To that they did not take exception. What they did take exception to was that the Government, instead of leaving this matter to the Transvaal to settle under responsible self-government, were going to say to the Transvaal that if they did something not in accordance with the ideas of the Imperial Government in this matter proper restraint would be placed upon them. That could only mean one thing, which was "proper restraint," as interpreted by the hon. Gentlemen opposite—the Imperial veto. The speech which the hon. Gentleman had made to-day would, he ventured to say, be received in the Transvaal with the same doubt, with the same criticisms, and with the same indignation which his previous speeches had evoked. The hon. Gentleman would find that he had only stimulated the determination of the Transvaal to have their own way. The mining industry, he thought, was not quite understood in this House. It was the one great industry of the country, of the whole of South Africa; it was not, as some supposed, a speculative industry. Any one who had been on the reefs and had seen the amount of machinery at work there—most of which was made in England—could never again look at the Transvaal mining industry as a speculative industry engineered by people from Park Lane bent on meeting great fortunes. It was true that some fortunes had been made, but they were made before the Chinese came in and were made out of the use of native labour. The mines were the real basis upon which the future development of the country must rest, and to interfere with their prosperity would be to interfere with the progress of the Transvaal as a whole. It was important in this connection to bear in mind that prosperity was the cement which would be most efficacious in binding together Boer and Briton in South Africa.

*MR. CAWLEY (Lancashire, Prestwich) said the hon. Member who had just spoken seemed to imagine that South Africa could be made prosperous and contented only by the aid of Chinese labour. Most Ministerialists were of exactly the opposite opinion. A great British Colony could not be built up by the aid of Chinese labour. If the money spent in recruiting Chinese labour and building compounds had been used for cheapening living in South Africa, we should have found respectable white working men settling in the colony. When they saw capitalists on one side and Chinamen on the other, whose only object was to work the mines out and then leave the country altogether, did anyone think a market would be created for British goods? A quarter of the number of labourers, if white, with their wives and families out in South Africa, would make a far better market for British goods than the Chinese did. The Leader of the Opposition, in a speech he made recently, gave his audience to understand that South Africa would be ruined if the mines had not Chinese labour. He supposed the right hon. Gentleman was not aware that in 1898 the mines in South Africa paid nearly £5,000,000 in dividends without a single Chinaman being employed. How, then, could he say that South Africa would be ruined if there was not Chinese labour in the mines? More than that, from 1897 to 1898 the output of gold in South Africa increased by nearly 1,000,000 ounces. In fact, the output of gold since Chinese labour had been imported had not increased in so great a ratio as it did without Chinese on the Rand. The Leader of the Opposition had quoted the opinion of newspapers in favour of Chinese labour, but such papers as the Leader and the Star of Johannesburg were notoriously under the influence of the mineowners. It was not the opinion of the Transvaal. If hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side wanted the opinion of the Transvaal, why did they not have a plebiscite taken before the Chinese Labour Ordinance was passed? The Ordinance had been the greatest curse a British Government had ever foisted on a British Colony, and it would never create a real British Colony and one that would help the mother country by taking her goods. If the policy of indentured labour were continued, as soon as the mines were worked out—and, according to the great authorities, the output of gold would begin to diminish in about twenty-five years—the chances were that Johannesburg would eventually become derelict, and the Transvaal would revert to the Boers. If we were to have a prosperous British Colony in South Africa the mining industry must be principally worked with white labour. He believed this could be done, because if they had Kaffir labour they could employ white labour as well. They could not have a white man and a black man digging in the same hole, but they could have different sets of workers. There were thousands of white labourers who would be only too glad to go to the Transvaal if they could make a living wage. That living wage could be paid and yet the mines could make good dividends. Fortunes in South Africa had not been made out of the gold-mining industry at all, but in the floating of mines. All the Park Lane money had not come from the working of the mines, but out of the pockets of the British public. Men got hold of a certain number of claims for which they paid perhaps £250,000, and in addition had £250,000 of working capital. They immediately put the mine on the British market at, say, £800,000. They did not issue a prospectus, but perhaps offered the shares at £4. The British public subscribed about £3,000,000, and that was where the money came from. Yet they were told they must have Chinese labour to pay dividends on these enormous capitals. It would be infinitely better for South Africa if there were a lot of white men there earning good wages, than to have Chinamen employed and that the dividends should be sent to Park Lane, Germany, and France, where he believed the greater portion of them went. He was a shareholder in South African mines before the war, and was still, and his opinion was that if they had not had a single Chinaman on the Rand they would be better off than they were to-day. The shares were worth more before the Chinamen went there. If the Chinamen had done any good the value of the shares would have appreciated. Therefore in every way possible, so far as he could see, the Chinamen were a very bad thing for South Africa and for this country. What we had to contemplate was this: if these mineowners were to have their own way, they would have 250,000 Chinamen in the mines, and he did not think anyone in the House would contemplate with equanimity such a vast preponderance of yellow men over the small white population. It had been seen that the Kaffirs were not quite so contented as people had been led to think, and if there was any such thing as a Kaffir rising and there were 250,000 Chinamen in the compounds, he did not think it would be a very happy state of affairs for the white population in the Transvaal.

*MR. BOULTON (Huntingdonshire, Ramsey) said that in his view it would not be a dangerous thing on the part of His Majesty's Government to veto any legislation that the new Government might pass, if that legislation were similar to the Ordinance of the late Government. Nor did he think that our great Colonies would for a moment resent the action of His Majesty's Government in vetoing any such legislation, because our great Colonies were absolutely agreed that they did not approve of the action of the late Government in introducing Chinese labour into South Africa. There was the unanimous protest of the great Australian Colonies as expressed in the Commonwealth Parliament against the introduction of Chinese labour, and there was the same thing in New Zealand. Canada thought it was inadvisable under the circumstances to interfere, but the opinion of Canada from one end to the other was against the Chinese being brought into any of the great Colonies of the Empire. If the suggested veto were exercised under the circumstances he believed it would have the support of Canada, Australia and New Zealand, and in that case he failed to see how it could be a menace to the Empire. As to the question of precedent, those who had studied the constitutions of the colonies and their relation with the mother country knew it was a fact that the Imperial Parliament had a right of veto, and had exercised it with regard to Australia and Canada, though, of course, it had never been exercised unless a Colony had passed something which was ultra vires. Surely, if the Transvaal Government were to pass an act of the legislature which authorised the practice of slavery, or anything which was akin to slavery, His Majesty's Government would be justified in exercising that veto. There were many reasons why personally he would much sooner His Majesty's Government, when they gave a constitution to the Tranvaal, inserted—as had been done in the case of California—an express provision prohibiting actual slavery, or anything partaking of the nature of slavery. If that was done then it would be for the courts of law to decide what was, and what was not slavery and His Majesty's Government would not then be obliged to exercise the veto. He himself, knowing something of the great Colonies, did not believe that the Transvaal, if the new constitution was based on popular representation, would do anything to introduce into the Colony anything partaking of the nature of slavery, but if they did His Majesty's Government would be entitled to exercise the veto upon it, and in doing that he believed they would have the support of all the self-governing Colonies in the Empire.

*MR. NIELD (Middlesex, Ealing) said he had heard laudations of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister by a certain section of the Press in this country who had been his good friends during the election, and to whom the right hon. Gentleman had expressed his deep sense of his obligation —a section for which he had the most profound contempt, and especially the section which emanated from Stonecutter Street and issued in the morning the Morning Leader and in the evening The Star. It was the Morning Leader which was the source of that cartoon which it delighted to describe as the "famous poster," that pictorial falsehood which dealt with Chinese labour and called it "slavery," but which he (the speaker) designated the "infamous poster." Yet the Party opposite professed themselves perfectly satisfied with it, notwithstanding the fact that right hon. Gentlemen were juggling and playing with the word "slavery," and betraying a strange want of unanimity as to what the condition of the Chinese in the Transvaal really was. Even the last speaker had repeated as an accepted fact that slavery did exist, while the leaders preferred to use such phrases as "ingredients of slavery," and "taint of slavery." For British Ministers to be driven into a corner and to discriminate so finely as to what prevailed in the Transvaal was a sorry spectacle for this great Empire. When the Government declined to give effect to the suggestion which had been made from time to time that they should appoint a Commission of inquiry to ascertain what were the true facts, the only inference which he as a lawyer practising in the courts could draw was that they were afraid to submit the circumstances to an impartial tribunal lest it should be found that the verdict would be against the methods they had used, and on the strength of which they had sailed into power. An hon. Member opposite who talked with an air of authority about South Africa and its problems had been obliged to admit that he spoke from other than the point of view of practical experience, since he had never been there. It was this kind of assumed knowledge on the part of politicians of which he (the speaker) complained. Hon. Members condemned persons and systems of which they had no personal knowledge, and in the face of the recorded experience of those who, by long residence and practical acquaintance, were entitled to speak with authority. References were sometimes made in the South African debates to the magnates who lived in Park Lane, but he did not see why they should be subjected to obloquy by hon. Members, some of whom did not live far from that place. The truth was, and it had been told over and over again, that mining shares were held not merely by persons directly interested in mining operations, but by the great volume of the British investing public, and the effect of these charges of slavery was to hurt a great number of innocent persons who had invested their money with the best expectation that they would have the ordinary reward for their investment. They were all familiar with the argument about the Colony of New Zealand. In that Colony the question of slavery in connection with the employment of the Chinese in the South African mines never entered into their calculations. It was purely a question of the white man as against the coloured man, and, therefore, they had not considered it from the moral or the economic point of view. Australia for the same reason determined that whatever came she would not have a coloured population. [AN HON. MEMBER: "Hear, hear."] An hon. Gentleman said "Hear, hear." Did he know that in the northern part of that great Colony there were mines of very great wealth which could only be worked by coolie labour? Because of the policy of preventing any but white men from working, these mines must remain in a virgin condition merely to keep up a fetish which was economically wrong and absurd.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): Will the hon. Gentleman be good enough to say what the mines are that can be worked only by coolie labour in Australia?

*MR. NIELD said he was always ready to give information. He should have thought that it was information which the hon. Gentleman himself possessed. There were mines on the north coast which, owing to conditions of temperature, could not be worked by British-born subjects. Rather than admit coolie or Kaffir labour the colony allowed these mines to go unworked and unproductive. He ventured to think that the restriction put by California on the introduction of Chinese labour had arisen from a totally different reason. There had been plenty of Chinamen allowed to enter San Francisco in the past. He did not think he was very far wrong in stating that the condition of San Francisco to-day was very largely due to the industry of Chinamen. Having utilised the Chinaman for their purpose, they saw what the late Mr. Gladstone said of him, that the Chinaman was much more sinned against than sinning, and that he was disliked for his virtues and not his vices. The Chinaman was capable of exercising great frugality and of laying by more of this world's goods than his American competitor. That was the reason why America had prohibited Chinese labour. [AN HON. MEMBER: Since 1879.] He took 1879 as a comparatively modern date. It was about that time that a great labour movement took place, and the people of America saw the necessity for some sort of protection. After all was said and done, if the Chinese were only allowed to go to the Transvaal unfettered and without being obliged to work under special conditions, he thought it would be found that industry generally in the Transvaal would be very much more developed. He had heard it suggested in this House that the Chinese were such a terrible people, that unless they were kept under restrictions partaking of slavery, or tainted with slavery, it was impossible for them to be properly controlled, and that the countryside would be laid waste by their depredations. A return was presented to the late Parliament showing the number of outrages alleged to have been committed by Chinamen who had escaped from the compounds. Hon. Members on the other side had held up their hands in pious horror at these crimes, although they were numerically comparatively small. But would hon. Members believe that those crimes were nothing to arouse any alarm on the part of the population of this country? Being a lawyer, he attended the assizes, and he could tell hon. Members that he was shocked when he first made the acquaintance of the assize calendar for the county of Durham. The calendars of crime in some of the northern counties of this country would, he ventured to think, compare with the offences stated to have been committed by the Chinese in South Africa, and not altogether unfavourably to the latter. He thought the time had come when they should clear their minds of cant altogether. Let them face the facts boldly. Let them admit that the conditions under which Chinamen were brought to the Transvaal were such as to compel them to prescribe these regulations, but do not let them say that they had to enforce these because of the inherent immorality or violence of Chinamen. It was done in order to keep faith with the Colonies of Australia and New Zealand and at the same time to meet a great and pressing emergency in South Africa. He was perfectly certain that the mine-owners would not have dreamt of introducing Chinese labour by choice. They had been compelled to do so by necessity, and they had incurred enormous cost in providing compounds for the men. He thought it would be more in accordance with the traditions of the Radical Party if the Government were to agree to the appointment of the Commission of Inquiry which had now been asked. This was the second time in the history of the great Liberal Party that they had refused to examine into the facts in a businesslike and thorough way, but had jumped to conclusions prompted by expediency, and in order to make Party capital for electoral purposes. They did this also in connection with the great fiscal controversy, and prevented an independent and non Party examination, preferring rather to go to the country on representations which were not founded on fact. He trusted that the Government would no longer resist the appeal for an impartial tribunal which would clear the honourable escutcheon of this country from the foul stains that had been thrown upon it.

MR. SEDDON (Lancaster, Newton) said that he was one of those Members returned at the last general election, who as a candidate spoke from the hustings of the conditions under which the Chinese indentured coolies worked in the Transvaal as conditions of slavery and contrary to all his ideas of British freedom. And not all the dialectical skill of right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition Benches or the "terminological inexactitudes" on the Ministerial side had altered his opinion. He believed he could speak for all the Labour Members and for the large majority of the working people of this country, in saying that they looked upon the introduction of Chinese coolies into South Africa as not only a flagrant breach of promises made by the late Government, but a breach of those institutions which were held dear by every Britisher. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham seemed to have had quite a passion for Commissions of late, and in asking for a new Royal Commission he referred to people in South Africa speaking the same language as ourselves. It might be true that some of these gentlemen had learned, as a linguistic feat, some words of the English language. But this was not a question of language, but a question of sympathy with British instincts. He asked whether the Member who spoke from the corner block at Johannesburg, who looked upon this House as an annexe of the Stock Exchange, and a hutch of guinea-pigs, represented the sentiments of the people of this country. Mr. Percy Talbot, who spoke for a big Rand firm with foreign names, had said that the natural fear on the Rand was that with the introduction of white unskilled labour there the same troubles would arise in South Africa as had prevailed in Australia, that by their combinations and trade unions they would be able to dictate the rate of wages and by their votes the policy of the country. That was the open and unabashed contention of the Rand mineowners. He asked the right hon. Member for West Birmingham who were the experts he would send out on this proposed Royal Commission to South Africa, and who were the people who spoke with authority in South Africa? On the Labour Commission of 1897 in South Africa there were two Labour representatives, and those gentlemen declared in their minority Report that there was a sufficiency of coloured labour, so far as the natives of South Africa were concerned, and that there was no necessity for the introduction of Chinese coolie labour. After that a great demonstration was held in Johannesburg, at which 5,000 white men were present, to protest against the intention of the Government to introduce Chinese indentured labour into the Colony. The hon. Member for Gravesend had brought a photo into the House from that reliable authority—the Daily Graphic—and had made light of the demonstration which took place in December last. The information of the hon. Member had evidently come from different sources from his own. In the early part of this year he received from Mr. Woods, Secretary to the Trade Council in Johannesburg, a type-written description of that meeting. Mr. Woods declared that it was necessary for his council to go to the expense of the type-written report because they could not trust the Press in South Africa, which was under the heel of the capitalists on the Rand. The hon. Member for Gravesend brought this photograph to belie that meeting as to its size. He was there to say, on the authority of Britishers in South Africa, who were just as anxious as Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House to bring about peace and prosperity in South Africa, that the Chinaman was not wanted, and that with the native the Britisher could do all that was required in the gold mines of South Africa. He would like to ask right hon. Gentlemen, including the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, who seemed to be briefed for the Corner House in Johannesburg, this question—they heard a lot about the mortality in the mines of South Africa, but had the same conditions been applied to the gold mines of South Africa as were applied to the coal mines of this country? He was told on reliable authority that if the same precautions and regulations were in operation in the South African gold mines as were in operation in the coal mines of this country, the death rate would go down considerably and make it much more easy for white men to work the gold mines. When he was listening to the right hon. Member for West Birmingham he had in his mind one feature of all the debates that had taken place in this House. Either it was a question of cheap labour, or labour under decent conditions. If he remembered rightly, when the Factory Laws were being passed, Gentlemen stood up in this House and declared that it would be against the interests of the industry if they did anything to interfere with the morality of the men who were running the factories at the time. The argument was as old as the hills:—"Cheap labour is increasing." What for? He remembered the great price that had been paid for the subjection of South Africa, and he remembered who had suffered most. Hon. Members talked about the financiers and investors who were suffering in South Africa. But what about the Britisher? Many of them had shed their blood there. What about the working-classes of this country, who were taxed up to the teeth and whose scanty hoards had had to pay for this war? If there was any sacrifice made, it was by those who could ill afford it—the working-classes of this country. They ought to have some voice in deciding the future policy of South Africa. What was the result? The democracy of this country believed that the introduction of Chinese coolies into South Africa was slavery. They asked the Government to get rid of it at once, if possible, and failing that, they said:—"Get rid of it as soon as you can." He believed that an assurance had been given by the Under-Secretary for the Colonies that Chinese indentured labour in South Africa would finish some time—would finish eventually.

MR. SEDDON said he could not take the Leader of the Opposition as the interpreter of the Under-Secretary. If the Under-Secretary had not given the assurance, hon. Members below the gangway believed he had, and if he desired—perhaps he did not—their co-operation in the settlement of this question he would give them the assurance at once. They understood that the Government were determined that Chinese indentured labour should finish in South Africa. He hoped he was interpreting the intention of the Government rightly. If not, then he thought there was trouble ahead for somebody. He wanted to say, in conclusion, that he sympathised with those expressions that had been made on both sides of the House that this was a very serious question. He, along with a good number outside this House, felt that the war was wrong when it was undertaken. When it was being waged they were assured by right hon. Gentlemen now on the Opposition side of the House that it was a war for equal rights for all white men. Where was the right of the white now? He had a letter in his pocket which arrived from Cape Town only yesterday morning from a Britisher, which told him that there were thousands of white men walking the streets of Cape Town to-day. Many of them helped to bring about the overthrow of the two free Republics in South Africa. That was their return for their loyalty. He would remind hon. Members on both sides that there were higher claims than those of the Stock Exchange. These people had made sacrifices for the people of the British Empire, and he asked the right hon. Gentleman to consider the questions of the development of South Africa not on the lines of indentured Chinese labour, but on lines by means of which he could alleviate the misery of white men who were now walking the streets without employment and in a starving condition.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is under the impression not only that has the Under-Secretary for the Colonies made a clear declaration of the policy of the Government, but that the declaration is to the effect that Eastern labour is in a short time, or at all events before long, to come to an end. He is, I think, mistaken in both particulars. The Under-Secretary has never pledged either the Colonial Office or the Government to terminate yellow indentured labour in South Africa.

MR. WALLACE (Perth): In existing conditions.

MR. BALFOUR: I do not know what line of escape the hon. Gentleman has got, or whether the Government contemplate that there should be yellow labour admitted not under existing conditions. Whether that is desirable or not I leave the hon. Gentleman who preceded me to consider.

MR. SEDDON: I am sorry to intervene, but I wish to make it perfectly clear that so far as the Party with which I am connected is concerned we have no race war. It is not against the Chinaman as a Chinaman, but the conditions under which he is permitted to land in South Africa, that we are opposed to.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I thought that the view of the hon. Gentleman was similar to the view expressed earlier in the debate by the hon. Member for Preston, which was to the effect that if yellow or oriental labour was not introduced into South Africa, the white man would have a chance there, that there would be cottages springing up there in which white men would live with their wives and families, that they would go to South Africa in large numbers and carry the principles of British liberty with them, and that you would find that unskilled labour in South Africa would be British labour and not unskilled labour from Central Africa or the Far East. That, I understand, however, is not the view of the hon. Gentleman. He does not in the least object to the unlimited importation and unrestricted competition of oriental labour with British labour in the Transvaal, but he objects to the limitations which have been placed upon the indefinite introduction of the coolie from the East into all branches of industry. He only objects to the limitation of Chinese labour; he does not object to Chinese labour without limitations. That is a view which is perfectly arguable, but those who hold it cannot hold at the same time that their ideal is to see South Africa a country in which the unskilled as well as the skilled labour is carried on by Europeans and especially by men of British birth. The two things cannot exist together; that is certain. It is equally certain that the limitations to which the hon. Gentleman objects are in favour of the competiton of British and European work, and so far from being contrary to the ideal which some Gentlemen on that side of the House desire, they are in favour of it. I have corrected one error that the hon. Gentleman has made with regard to the Under-Secretary when I informed him that the Under-Secretary has given no such pledge. I will go further and say, so far as I understand the Under-Secretary's varying utterances, not only has he not promised to carry out that policy, but there is no particular or single policy he has promised to carry out. He has promised to carry out two or three policies, and they not consistent one with another. I was surprised to hear him repudiate the view which he quite distinctly expressed in the House that the Transvaal Government when they had obtained independence would probably exercise that independence in introducing Chinese labour. My right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham was perfectly accurate. I heard the Under-Secretary's speech, and this brief extract from The Times exactly accords with my recollection. Possibly the hon. Member did not say precisely what he meant, but these are the words he did use—

> "What chance was there of the Transvaal proposals being acceptable when put forward? He felt bound to say the chance was not a good one."

MR. CHURCHILL: I think it will be clear from the context that the question I asked was what chance was there of proposals being acceptable when put forward, assuming they were put forward.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know whether that greatly helps the hon. Gentleman. His Government propose to give self-government to the Colony. Three things may happen. The Colony may put forward no proposal at all, they may put forward proposals which are acceptable, or they may put forward proposals which are not acceptable. That they will put forward no proposal at all I think is in the highest degree improbable. Of the other two alternatives, the hon. Gentleman clearly laid it down in his speech that the probability was in favour of the proposals not being acceptable when and if put forward—he says it appears in the context, and I am prepared to take his exegesis of his own oration. If and when these proposals are put forward, in the opinion of the hon. Gentleman and the Government the chance of their being acceptable is not a good one. I am bound to say that these words justify all the forebodings which those who know most about the feeling which our Colonies have with regard to this question of the Government interfering with the Colonies possessing self-government—put forward. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last but one, and professed to have great knowledge of the Colonies, was confident that none of the Colonies would raise the smallest protest if this country interfered to put down slavery. Yes, sir; but I myself think the Colonies would probably say "It is for each of us to judge what is or is not slavery. We do not hand over our own moral judgment to the Mother Country; we claim that as part of the rights of Englishmen to whom self-government has been given." Although it may be that the inhabitants of Canada, of New Zealand, and of Australia may think the Government of the self-governing Transvaal has made a great mistake, but I am perfectly confident they will say they are the judges, they and they alone, of their own action, and however much either Great Britain or the other Colonies may differ from them, it is a deliberate invasion of the traditions of this country that we should attempt to impose upon them our own ideas of precisely how they should conduct matters which are intimately bound up with their own welfare, I had almost said their own existence. I do not want to treat this matter with unnecessary controversy, and I do not want to go back to the past. I support my right hon. friend in pressing for this inquiry, not in order to justify us as against hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite with regard to what occurred at the General Election. Each of us probably will remain of the same opinion as to the justice or injustice of the attacks made upon us. I am looking forward to the future, and it is in order that the future may carry with it as little difficulty, as little misfortune, and as little peril to the Empire as possible, that I earnestly urge the Government to accede to our request. I venture to think the whole course of this debate has been really in favour of the inquiry suggested, and that the speeches of those who have nominally supported the Government have been really as much in favour of an inquiry as any speeches made on this side. For instance, the hon. Gentleman who has just at down said—

> "I am unregenerate; I hold to the case which I held to at the General Election. I used strong language about the existence of a system which I regard as slavery. I have not changed that opinion."

The hon. Gentleman I am perfectly certain honestly holds the views which he has expressed to the House, but I also am unregenerate, and I also hold the view which I expressed at the General Election. I certainly honestly came to the conclusion that the introduction of Chinese labour was in the interests of South Africa and the Transvaal, and was absolutely necessary. As between myself and the hon. Gentleman, I am perfectly prepared to let the matter sleep—at all events I do not wish to revive it at this moment. But as regards the future, I think the hon. Gentleman will agree with me that two men, both presumably intelligent, honest, and anxious to know exactly what is the condition of affairs in South Africa, ought to agree upon providing some machinery which should, if not decide the question between them, at all events give them facts which they can both accept. I, like the hon. Member, spoke strongly at the elections. I believe myself, as he believes himself, to have adequate grounds for the views which I put forward. To appoint this committee is, I think, the best policy in the interests of South Africa. I considered—and I am sure the hon. Gentleman will accept my statement—I considered only the situation in the Transvaal. I certainly honestly came to the conclusion that in the interest of South Africa and of the Transvaal this was an absolutely necessary measure. I need not trouble my head about gold magnates and the other extraneous considerations which have been dragged into this debate. I may have been mistaken. I will go this length with the House. It seemed to me that my case was so very clear that I had the very greatest difficulty sometimes in believing that those who took the opposite view were not, even unknown to themselves, violently swayed and prejudiced by those natural passions to which we are all, perhaps, unduly subject in moments of great political conflict. I acknowledge now that I have come to the conclusion that the belief which the hon. Gentleman and others have expressed to-day does represent a very genuine, real, and deep-rooted conviction in large classes of the community. I accept that, and I hope they will accept the statement which I make with equal certitude, that the policy of the Government was in no sense swayed—it may have been mistaken, or foolish, or unnecessary—by any consideration whatever except the good of a colony which at the time was under our control. When you have two sets of genuine and honest opinions brought into such sharp contrast, and when those opinions turn on matters of fact, is it not the common-sense thing to have an inquiry by which those matters of fact can be ascertained? Consider the speech that was made by, I think, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Prestwich. The hon. Gentleman drew a picture of South Africa as he would wish to see it—and I frankly admit that the South Africa that he wishes to see is the South Africa that I myself would very much desire to see. He says, "Why cannot you have South Africa covered with well-built cottages, with the cost of living lowered to a point which will make the wages of the white man remunerative to the white man? Why cannot you have the unskilled labourers here emigrating to another part of the Empire, enjoying prosperity and bringing with them their wives and families, and becoming the ancestors of a race English in speech, English in blood, English in sentiment—a plant, which shall spread to yet another portion of the world, a community not merely of the well-to-do, or the middle-class or the skilled artisan, but of every class, forming the majority of the population?" That is an admirable picture if only it could be carried out. And whether it can be carried out or not surely does depend upon a matter of fact which can be determined by adequate inquiry, and that is whether or not what is admitted on all hands to be, for the present, the great industry of the country, can be carried on except with the help of unskilled labour, remunerated at lower rates than those which Englishmen either could, or would, or ought to accept. That surely is a question of fact, and that is a question on which I do seriously think that the necessity for some certitude is greatly increased now that we know what, at all events, is one of the Government policies upon this matter. One of their policies is to allow the Transvaal Government to make its proposals, and then quarrel with its proposals if they do not like them. It is a serious enough matter for us to quarrel with or over-ride a self-governing colony, but to do that upon imperfect information, to do that with no adequate knowledge of what the real facts of the case are, to do that with the hon. Gentleman who spoke last, saying, with conviction, "I believe one set of opinions," and with another hon. Gentleman, say myself, saying with equal conviction and consistency, "I believe another set of opinions," without an appeal to a tribunal, the value of which, whether we accept it or not, both are prepared to recognise—is it not really ignoring the dangers and difficulties of the future to refuse now to carry out an inquiry which would give this House and any Government that was in power that knowledge without which it is really impossible to deal with the complicated and difficult question we have to deal with? By all means, if you wish, exclude any inquiry into the past. Assume, if you wish, that everything said about the abuse of the system under the late Government was true. If you do not want to inquire into that, let it alone. But, at all events, see what is going on now; see whether the system as it is now worked does really deserve or not the attacks which the hon. Gentleman is at present prepared to make upon it; see whether it is or is not the best possible form in which the unskilled labour necessary to the community may be introduced. I think every one who heard the Under-Secretary for the Colonies will admit that, at all events, he was very much put to it to find a reason for not giving an inquiry. He complained of the shortness of notice which my right hon. friend had given of his Amendment, and I presume that was the reason why he spent most of his speech in a personal attack upon my right hon. friend. That, I am aware, is a form of debate which requires no preparation on the part of the hon. Gentleman, or on the part of many of those who sit near him. That is a beverage which is always on tap. But, when he left that familiar field, what had he say to against this inquiry? "Oh," he said, "Commissions. We know what you mean by Commissions. Commissions are always expedients for deferring any action." That is a thing which Oppositions are very fond of saying against Governments, but I have never heard it said by a Government against an Opposition. These Gentleman cannot get accustomed to their places. The time will come when they will learn to put off the garb of Opposition which they wore with so much grace for so many years, and to accustom themselves both to the power and to the courtesy which ought to accompany power, when they are put in the possession of a following of 500—or is it 600—faithful henchmen. Surely the Under-Secretary was peculiarly unfortunate in this particular line of defence, because, if I remember, the great programme of the Liberal Government now in power which is slowly unfolding and unwinding itself before our eyes began with the promise of a Commission on canals. And, unless I am greatly mistaken, another Commission was promised last night to look into Trinity College, another Commission has been promised to look into sea-coast erosion, and a fourth Commission has been appointed to look into coal mine accidents. And there is a Commission to look into Post Office matters. That is five. Five Commissions in five weeks is not bad. And I am bound to say that when the hon. Gentleman, trading upon his ancient experience in another position, talked of the iniquities of Commissions, it showed surely a very small appreciation of the labours of other departments of governmental activity, and a very small relative appreciation of the importance of the subjects to be inquired into. I do not wish to undervalue sea erosion. I certainly do not wish to undervalue Trinity College, and even canals have my sincere respect. But I would ask the House whether any of the five subjects, even including the Post Office, are of so great importance as this great issue which has divided, and is dividing, honest and honourable men in this House and out of this House, and on the true knowledge of which so much must depend in the future conduct of what all admit is a very difficult situation? The Government may think, they certainly have said, that the object of the Opposition in regard to South African policy is simply to embarrass them. I can assure them that that is not the case. We feel very strongly upon certain aspects of the question; but this Motion of my right hon. friend might be considered surely as outside the area of bitter Party controversy. It refers only to the facts, it refers only to the future. We ask really to know under what conditions it is possible to carry on indentured labour, or, at all events, under what conditions it is now being carried on, and what kind of labour is necessary to deal with the mines. On that last subject, which is a vital one, not to the mineowners, but to the Transvaal, there seems to be a most extraordinary confusion of ideas in the minds of some hon. Members. It does not in the least matter for our purpose what was the original cost to the mineowner, or whether he has unduly watered his capital; whether he has or has not deluded the public, whether the shareholders have or have not been defrauded or deprived of their money. What is of importance, from the point of view of the Transvaal, to know is what constant production will enable the great industry to flourish; and by flourishing I do not mean paying big dividends: I mean paying working expenses with a reasonable profit. Call the capital what you like, you must pay for the working expenses of the mine, you must pay a fair interest on capital, else you will have no development, and you must pay, I suppose, a reasonable commercial interest. Estimate it at that. Put Park Lane and everything else out of your mind, or keep Park Lane for the country. But in discussing what is necessary for the Transvaal, the prosperity or the adversity, the wickedness or the virtue of the capitalist or the small investor—these things are of comparatively small importance. What is of importance is to know the conditions under which the industry can be carried on. That is a different question, and it is a question on which I believe expert opinion could give valuable information. I believe the hon. Gentleman who last spoke and myself would have much to learn from such an inquiry. I did my best to find out. The sources from which I obtained the views I hold may possibly not have been wholly trustworthy. Then appoint a trustworthy authority. Give me a chance. I used the best opinions at my disposal; but appoint a Commission to show whether I am wrong. I cannot understand on what grounds the Government refuse this. My right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham pointed out with unanswerable force that some of the objections which may be urged against some Commissions—namely, that they delay the settlement of a question which might be settled without a Commission—do not apply in this case. Not an hour's delay will be caused in the settlement of this great problem if you consent to our demands. Why do you refuse us? Is it the mere insolence of overgrown strength? Is it because you know yourselves to be so overwhelmingly strong in numbers that even a most respectful request is to be met with this kind of unargued opposition? Not the semblance of an argument has been advanced against the proposal. Very good speeches have been made against the Opposition, speeches of which I have nothing to complain. They were attacks upon us and upon the mine-owners: they were a repetition of the kind of speech with which we have all been familiar for the last few months; but none of them have been arguments against the inquiry. The hon. Member for Prestwich advanced no argument against it; nor did the hon. Gentleman who followed him on that side. As for the Under-Secretary, those who heard his speech heard a great deal of discussion of the general question, a great deal of abuse of my right hon. friend, a considerable unintentional perversion of his own previous utterances, and a general attack on Commissions; but against this Commission, against the request which we respectfully urge, not one thing that could be called an argument. We have no power to make our appeal effective. If argument is useless we have nothing else to show. I venture to say that argument we have put forward; and if now you express your intention of deliberately refusing information to this House upon subjects upon which the House is honestly but deeply divided, and if that refusal is going to carry with it, as I fear it may, ill consequences in the future, the responsibility must at all events rest upon the Government which has thus, as I think, made a great and unjustifiable misuse of its Parliamentary majority.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The right hon. Gentleman complains of an unargued refusal which has been given to this proposal, and he makes this allegation after having listened to the speech of my hon. friend the Under-Secretary for the Colonies, which was a prolonged argument. I will repeat now briefly some of the arguments which my hon. friend used. But I am left greatly in doubt as to what the object of the two right hon. Gentlemen is. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham claims an inquiry in order that the culprits may be found and brought to punishment if misdeeds have been committed. The Leader of the Opposition, on the other hand, said, "Oh, we have nothing to do with the past."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Oh, no, the right hon. Gentleman has misunderstood me. I should like an inquiry covering the past, present, and future. I thought right hon. Gentlemen opposite had an objection to going into matters which were historical, and I said in deference to their view, "By all means leave that out, if you like." But I should personally prefer an inquiry into the whole.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The right hon. Gentleman in his speech did not give us much indication of deference to our view. He was emphatic on the subject that we should turn to the future and leave the past. Therefore, we are in the old dilemma—the old dilemma in which Castor says one thing, and Pollux says another. One right hon. Gentleman said, "Get it out of the area of bitter controversy; we have nothing to do with the past"; the other right hon. Gentleman wishes to inquire into the past. Sir, what are you to inquire into that you have not got already? If evidence is required of misdeeds and abuses under this system, you have abundant evidence in your own Blue-books. And it stands in the nature of things that there should be those abuses, because an unnatural system such as this necessarily leads to abuses. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham the other day on another subject used a phrase which was very much to the point. We were talking of flogging in the Navy, and he said he had often had to deal with cases of flogging when he was in charge of a great Department, and he added, "The difficulty is that you cannot depend upon your instruments." That is the case here above most other instances. Let this be distinctly understood. We have no quarrel with the Transvaal people or even with the leading men in the Tranvaal. We have no quarrel even with the working of the system—at least, that is not the main point. What we have a quarrel with are the Ordinances which prescribe certain conditions for the Chinese coolie which we believe to be contrary to the best traditions and the purest conscience and the highest views of the British people. No Royal Commission that you can appoint can tell us whether we are right or wrong. That is the feeling of the great majority of the British people. In this, surely, they are entirely within their proper sphere, because, as I have said, these Ordinances were passed by the late House of Commons, and at the instigation of the late Government. It is we who passed the Ordinances, and therefore we are responsible. Those of us who voted against them, or protested against them, of course have a slighter responsibility; but still we cannot altogether hold ourselves free, and that is what we complain of. We dislike having fastened upon a British colony certain Ordinances prescribing conditions of labour which we believe—I will repeat the phrase that I have often used—partake of the nature of slavery. But I think it is time we ceased to make any more to do about the particular phrase to be used. The other day the noble Lord the Member for Marylebone said that what the people of this country objected to was popular slavery, not technical slavery. It may not be technical slavery, but in the popular sense and the popular acceptation of the word it is slavery. I can tell the right hon. Gentleman that the people of this country are not going to stand anything of that sort of system in any country for which they have any responsibility. As to the question of the admission of Chinese to labour in the Colonies for the purposes of free labour, that I regard as a domestic matter in which we are not entitled to interfere. But if that involves—as I know I should not be candid if I did not admit that in South Africa it does involve—the imposition upon them of conditions which we think degrading to the human race, and certain to produce the evil results which in some cases have followed—then, if we find that, we shall have nothing to do with those conditions, and we will endeavour to bring them to an end as soon as possible. That is a perfectly plain and straightforward and intelligible position. My hon. friend the Under-Secretary asked, in stirring language, whether this unnatural labour was the sort of basis upon which to build a new and prosperous community. If its prosperity depended upon that, what sort of fate would be likely to be in store for that community? I do not like, even in the shortest way, referring to one condition of which we hear little, but which is really an important factor in the matter, but my hon. friend alluded to it when he said that these men were forced to live in compounds in enforced celibacy. We know how we insisted, in the early stages of this matter, upon ample provision being made for wives and children going with them; we know what promises were made; and we know how completely that intention has been thwarted, either by the want of will on the part of the authorities, or the want of disposition on the part of the men themselves. In either case you have created a state of things which is perfectly appalling. And that is the condition of labour on which the prosperity of these great mines is to depend, and on which you are to build up, forsooth, a great buttress to the pride of the British Empire. The people of this country really do not half understand what is going on. If they once realised it there would be short work made of it, and even of all those pecuniary interests which we have been endeavouring to guard as far as we can. Yes, we have guarded them by what we have done. We have given time when the natural impulse would have been to give no time; and we have said that the future policy with regard to Chinese free labour is to be left to the community under the new constitution, though the present conditions must at all costs be brought to an end. The right hon. Member for West Birmingham, both to-day and on a previous occasion, made a great point of this interference with a self-governing Colony. He said he would only interfere where it was a matter of Imperial interest. Is this not a matter of Imperial interest? The right hon. Gentleman repeatedly taunted my friends with being guided by sentiment and morality. Yes, Sir, the British people have always been guided by sentiment and morality, and it is that fact largely which gives them their power and standing in the world. Are we to understand that that is to be given up, and a new policy is to be opened for this country? The right hon. Gentleman says you cannot interfere when you give self-government to a Colony. Here is what the late Colonial Secretary wrote when he was addressing Lord Selborne and sending out his proposal, not for full responsible, but for representative government—

> "His Majesty's Government have been unable, having regard to the terms of peace signed in 1902, to make provision for any of his Majesty's coloured subjects. As a protection for the interests of these sections of the population which are not directly represented in the Legislature, the Governor will, as now, be required by his instruction to reserve any Bill > whatever whereby persons not of European birth or descent may be subjected to any disability or restriction to which persons of European blood and descent are not subjected."

That is the instruction given to the Governor with regard to a representative system of government. It equally applies, mutatis mutandis, to a responsible government. You cannot wash your hands of your responsibility altogether. Self-government means that communities are set up which have full powers of representation. But have the Kaffirs and the Chinese those powers ? No, Sir, they have no means of making representations. They have no status. That is why an Imperial officer is placed in charge of natives even in a Colony like Natal; and that is why those powers must be always preserved, that we may see that these men who are in statu pupillari are treated with ordinary justice and consideration. That is the plain policy of the Government. I do not see anything dark about it; and in those circumstances, what good would a Royal Commission do ? It would have to inquire into two things—into the economic value of Chinese labour and into the moral aspect of it. As my hon. friend the Under-Secretary pointed out, how could the same men be competent to inquire into the two things ? [Cries of "Why not ?"] Engineers and experts would be required to inquire into the technical part of the question; and moral experts or men accustomed to consider the interests of morality would be required to inquire into the moral part of the question. The two things are inconsistent. No, Sir, on that we can judge for ourselves; and although the economic question is an interesting one, yet the inquiry would take a long time and would probably not be finished until responsible government was established in the country. I think it would be an unnecessary thing to enter upon that inquiry; but I can well imagine that the right hon. Member for Birmingham is anxious for it. Did he not tell the people of this country that they were engaged in a miners' war ? Did he not promise, not only equal rights to all white men, but especially proclaim that it was a miners' war on which the miners' prospects of occupation and livelihood depended ? I can imagine how it would be an interesting thing for him to inquire how it is that none of his prophecies have been fulfilled. He and his friends are now wondering whether or not the Chinese should be admitted in larger numbers still or whether it would be possible to ransack the country to find a few unemployed Kaffirs. It may be interesting for him to inquire into that question; but it is one that we at least can well leave to the Government of the Transvaal itself.

Question put.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

POLICE SUPERANNUATION BILL.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [6th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

LORD R. CECIL (Marylebone, E.) pointed out that this was a Bill which provided that the pension of a policeman should be forfeited if a testimonial was got up on behalf of the policeman on his leaving the force. That seemed to him to be a doubtful remedy for the evils complained of, and he thought the House should have some further explanation with regard to it.

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. HERBERT SAMUEL, Yorkshire, Cleveland) said that that was only in the case of a testimonial being improperly got up. Cases unfortunately occurred of an inspector on leaving the force going round the districts over which he had had control and to solicit the publicans in the district to subscribe to a testimonial for him.

LORD R. CECIL thought that the provisions of the Bill were much more general than that.

SIR FRANCIS LOWE (Birmingham, Edgbaston) said he thought there should be more time given to the discussion of this Bill.

MR. HERBERT SAMUEL: It has been discussed. It is your own Bill.

SIR FRANCIS LOWE said he was in a state of ignorance with regard to the provisions of the Bill, although he was supposed to be a supporter of it.

EVENING SITTING.

SOUTH AFRICA (HIGH COMMISSIONER).

*MR. BYLES (Salford, N.) rose to move, "That this House expresses its disapproval of the conduct of Lord Milner, as High Commissioner of South Africa and Governor of the Transvaal, in authorising the flogging of Chinese labourers in breach of the law, in violation of treaty obligations, and without the knowledge or sanction of His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies." He said that the fortune of the ballot had cast upon him a task which would have been, perhaps, better discharged by others, and while he would not shrink from the responsibilty placed upon him, he wished at the outset to disclaim all personal hostility to Lord Milner. The Times newspaper and a great many other newspapers and large numbers of anonymous correspondents had thought fit to accuse him for bringing forward this Motion of all sorts of motives, of petty spite, of black ingratitude, of sordid lust for Party gain. All this was very absurd. He had no vindictive spirit against Lord Milner. It was not so much of Lord Milner that he was thinking. It was the honour of the country that he was jealous for, it was the good faith and the self-respect of this House, it was that when the people of this country questioned the King's Ministers they should be able to rely upon assurances given by them. If the country was deceived, if illegality was condoned, if high officials were screened, and if injustice and cruelty were allowed to go unreproved, then in his judgment the highest interests of this country were in danger. In a memorable debate in this House, many years ago, on the subject of the high-handed action of a great administrator in South Africa, the right hon Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, speaking of Sir Bartle Frere, whom he styled "a self-willed politician," said—

> "This new Imperialism of the Government had affected the minds and judgments of those to whom were necessarily delegated the powers and authority of this country in distant lands. Unless this spirit were—either by Parliament or by the people—sternly and severely repressed, there could hardly be a limit to the difficulties, and even disasters, yet in store for this country."

What the right hon Gentleman said then he (Mr. Byles) said now. So much for the motive with which he brought forward this Resolution. He was concerned with the office of High Commissioner and with Lord Milner only as the holder of that office. If for no other reason, certain pleasant relations he had had with Lord Milner in days past would preclude any malice on his part. Further than that, he recognised Lord Milner as an eminent public servant; he did not forget the services Lord Milner had rendered to the country while he was at the Inland Revenue, when he gave such real and valuable assistance to the late Sir William Harcourt in the revolutionary Finance Bill of 1894; neither could he nor any Member of the House forget the work which Lord Milner had done in the reorganisation of Egypt and Egyptian finance. While he admitted that the services of Lord Milner at the Inland Revenue and in Egypt were deserving of the gratitude of the country —services which were marked and crowned with conspicuous success — he could not help thinking that his administration in South Africa had been an equally conspicuous failure. This Motion invited the House to express its disapproval of Lord Milner for sanctioning the flogging of Chinese labourers. The facts of the case were very simple. Lord Milner was approached by the mineowners who, after the war were unable to obtain sufficient native labour, and who asked him to allow them to import Asiatic labour. Lord Milner agreed, and the famous Ordinance was passed, solemn engagements were entered into between this country and the Chinese Empire, that the Chinese coolies brought over to the Rand should not be flogged except by order of the Court. Lord Milner, as High Commissioner of this country, broke that engagement deliberately and intentionally, and purposely withheld the knowledge of the decision to which he had come from the Government which he served.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No, no. Perhaps I may be permitted. I merely wish to know what it is the hon. Gentleman brings as a charge against Lord Milner. Does he mean to say, as he has just now said, that Lord Milner's action in those matters was taken deliberately, and that he purposely withheld the facts from the Government? The words used by the hon. Member were "deliberately" and "purposely."

*MR. BYLES said he certainly understood from Lord Milner's speech in the House of Lords the other night that he had done this knowingly, intentionally, and deliberately; he certainly did not desire to accuse Lord Milner of anything he did not wish to say, but that was what he understood him to say. At any rate Lord Milner quite frankly confessed so much in the House of Lords and very properly expressed his regret for it. In other words Lord Milner disapproved of his own conduct, and all that the Motion asked the House to do was to disapprove of it too. The speech in which Lord Milner made this confession was one of great interest from many points of view. It was his maiden speech, and in it he admitted quite frankly that he was responsible for the introduction of Chinese labour into the mines. At first he said he was as much opposed to it as all the rest of the white population of the Transvaal, except a handful of miners, and then he stated by what insidious manner he was converted. He said that white men could do the work, but not so cheaply. That was a most interesting point, because the House had been told thousands of times that white men could not do the work. Now they knew from Lord Milner that they could. He (Mr. Byles) had always said that the whole object of this Chinese labour was to get cheap labour, to get wages down and dividends up. Lord Milner further said that to the white man with his ideas such labour would mean degradation, and he (Mr. Byles) must admit he did not know a British working man who would submit to be flogged in the mines. But, said Lord Milner, it was "almost providential" when the Chinaman came along. Lord Milner was converted, and the Chinese came; they were beaten cruelly, and they complained. At length their complaints had reached this House. Questions were asked as to the truth of this flogging and whether it had taken place, and the Answer was no. But it had taken place, as they now knew, and it was sanctioned by Lord Milner Had it not been for Lord Milner's conversion we should not have had Chinese labour. The Chinese were brought because they were degraded creatures and would not mind being flogged. That was the only natural conclusion that could be drawn from the speech of Lord Milner. This state of things was justified on the principle that "the end justifies the means." The end was cheapness, the means were servile labour. It might be cheap and nasty, but it must be cheap. The fallacy lay in supposing that the prosperity of the Transvaal depended on gold-bearing quartz. Yet the people there were never so happy as they were before the gold was discovered, and, in his opinion, they would never be so happy again until the gold was all worked out, and the vultures which had fastened on it had taken flight. In the last generation this country had become far more humane, and men were beginning to see the stupidity as well as the brutality of flogging. These Chinese labourers had been called "animated machines." Suppose they were not "animated," the last thing anyone would do would be to beat them. When their bearings got hot, oil would be poured on them. But because they were men—of far more complex and delicate organisation than machines made of iron—the people of South Africa proceeded to knock them about in the manner described in Mr. Boland's letter. That was the kind of flogging that had been going on with the sanction of Lord Milner, although China had got the assurance, and relied on British honour for its fulfilment, that there should be no flogging without the sanction of the courts. Supposing an Admiral of the Fleet came to the First Lord of the Admiralty and said he could not maintain discipline on his ship unless he flogged the men, and supposing the First Lord of the Admiralty said, "all right, go on, but don't say anything about it," that would be a parallel case.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No it would not.

*MR. BYLES: There was once a philosopher who said you can do anything so long as you say nothing.

Mr. Byles.

*MR. BYLES: No, he was not the philosopher in question. When this Ordinance was passed the Chinese Ambassador stipulated that there should be no flogging except under the law, and he relied on British honour to see that that stipulation was carried out. Whoever was subject to the law was entitled to the protection of the law. The facts with regard to this case were not disputed, for the defendant had pleaded guilty. The Lord Chancellor, an illustrious Member of the Cabinet, and the highest judicial authority in the land, had said in the House of Lords

> "It was a flagrant illegality; it was illegal and Lord Milner knew it."

In these circumstances he was surprised that the Government did not see their way to accept his Motion. How came we to annex the Transvaal at all? Was it not alleged, at any rate, that it was because President Kruger could not enforce the law. Whenever the grievances of the Uitlanders were paraded before them, was it not always the miscarriage of justice that was the chief indictment? It was because the liberties of our people were not safe in the hands of President Kruger that we fought him and took his country from him. Lord Milner's own despatches in 1899 constantly laid stress on these things. It was not for the sake of the Chinese only that this Motion was brought forward. It concerned quite as much our relations with the Boers, and indeed with all races of non-British people in the King's Dominions. A new constitution was about to be given to the Transvaal, and the first thing to establish was absolute confidence in the administration of the law. The Boers were reputed to be a suspicious people. What would become of their confidence in us when they found breaches of the law sanctioned by the highest executive officer of the State, and sanctioned moreover in the interests of the very men whom they regarded as responsible for all the evils of the war, and for the wreckage of their country? There was an Amendment on the Paper by an hon. Gentleman deprecating the stirring up of racial animosity. Racial animosity had never been stirred up by keeping officers in the straight path, but it had been stirred up more than once by screening them and covering their lapses from virtue. He need only instance the Jameson Raid. After that event, had Dr. Jameson been punished and cashiered, President Kruger would have been perfectly satisfied, the Boers would not have been irritated, and there would have been no war. This House was the guardian of the national honour. It was also the guardian of the liberties of all the people who enjoyed the protection of our King. It was the guardian of the reputation of England for equality before the law for rich and poor, black and white and yellow. If this Resolution were rejected the offence of Lord Milner would be in a sense condoned. The humblest subject of the Empire would not be safe. Every prancing pro-consul in the Empire would be encouraged to play off his own bat, and pay regard not to the law but to his own sweet will. The Government had put down an Amendment to this Motion, and though in the main it agreed with this Motion it did not go quite so far. It was inmaterial to him in a sense into which lobby Members chose to go. The Motion and the Amendment both condemned the illegal flogging, but those who voted for this Motion desired to put on the journals of the House their express disapproval of that flogging. There was no essential difference between them. He would not be opposing the Government when he called for a division against their Amendment, nor would they be opposing him. If he thought there would be absolute unanimity in the House upon the Government Amendment he would withdraw his Resolution in order that there might be a unanimous vote. But he had reason to believe that that would not be the case under any circumstances, and therefore he should press this Motion to a division, and he hoped that a large number of Members would be undeterred by the great station and influence of Lord Milner from voting with him on the Motion he now moved.

*MR. MACKARNESS (Berkshire, Newbury) said he rose to second this Motion, but before doing so he must plead for that kindly indulgence which he believed was always extended to a Member who addressed the House for the first time. He was sure his hon. friend who brought forward this Motion, and they who were supporting him, would not be doing so unless they believed there were great questions at issue in this matter—questions which could not be ignored by this House without abdicating some of its most important functions and neglecting a clear duty. The House had known for some time that a high official of the Crown had so far mistaken his position as to permit systematic breaches of the law to be kept for many months from the knowledge of the Secretary of State, to whom he was bound to be frank to the utmost degree. Could any self-respecting government or legislature allow such conduct on the part of one of its servants to pass without rebuke? If any subordinate officer had committed the same breach of duty, would he have been allowed to go unpunished? Everybody must know that it would not have been the case. Why then should it be allowed to pass because the person implicated happened to occupy the very highest position that any subject could occupy in a great dependency? It might be said that Lord Milner no longer occupied that position. But Lord Milner resigned his position amid the plaudits of the hon. Members of the Party who supported him, and who were now on the Opposition side of the House, and the last thing that was said of him was an elaborate eulogy by the late Prime Minister. If anybody looking back on the records of this country should ask what the House of Commons thought of Lord Milner it would find nothing at all to condemn him except the reply given a few days ago by the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies, in answer to a Question, when he said Lord Milner had been guilty of a grave dereliction of duty.† The Resolution his hon. friend had moved appeared to him to be no more than an elaboration of the judgment then passed by the Under-Secretary. Therefore he thought they had a right to appeal to every supporter of the Government, at any rate, to support the Resolution of his hon. friend. He confessed that he did not quite understand the Amendment which had been put on the paper in the name of the Under-Secretary for the Colonies. The head of the Amendment was quite in accordance with the Resolution, but the tail of it, though couched in a truely Christian spirit, seemed to him to want that sting which every tail ought to have. As the mover had said they were not so much bringing a charge against an individual as passing sentence upon a series of admitted facts, which the more they were examined into the more serious became. They had led to persistent breaches of the law in regard to a matter about which Lord Milner knew the late Government were peculiarly sensitive. He referred to the flogging of natives. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham had always strongly opposed the flogging of natives. The despaches sent by the right hon. Gentleman in 1901–2 shewed that he had repeatedly instructed Lord Kitchener and Lord Milner to eliminate from the law of the Transvaal the flogging of natives. Then in 1904 in the negotiations which took place between the British Government and the Chinese Government before the Ordinance was passed, the Chinese Government insisted that in no case should it be allowable for an employer or his servant to inflict corporal punishment on the immigrant, and that violations of this prohibition should be punished at law as common assults. Lord Milner said there would be no difficulty in including that in the Ordinance, and also pointed out that the Chinese, like everybody else, would have the protection of the law, that flogging could not be inflicted except by the order of a magistrate, confirmed by a Judge. There was the clear assurance, given on the faith of the High Commissioner of South Africa, to the ambassador of a foreign Power, that in no circumstances should flogging be administered to a Chinese coolie except in accordance with the law of the land. What followed upon that? The Convention was passed providing that every Chinese coolie should have the same right of redress in the Courts of Justice in the Transvaal as subjects of all other races had. From March down to the end of July last year repeated assurances were given by Mr. Lyttelton that no flogging was taking place outside the Law Courts. Assurances were given in this House and in another place, and the actual number of persons flogged was mentioned, namely, six. The last assurance was given, he believed, by Mr. Lyttelton on the 27th July, to the effect that, so far as he knew, the law was being observed in the Transvaal with regard to this matter.[†] At the time that the House was being thus lulled into false security Lord Milner had left South Africa and was travelling slowly about Europe, finally reaching this country in July. On the day Mr. Lyttelton gave his last assurance, Lord Milner was admitted to Parliament, so that it was impossible to argue that he could not have been aware of what was going on in Parliament. He must have known what was going on in Parliament, and yet he allowed the Government, to whom he ought to have acted with loyalty and good faith, constantly to represent a false state of things to the House. Since Parliament rose in August last year the country remained under the belief that flogging was not being illegally carried on, though great uneasiness was felt owing to constant stories coming from South Africa. It was not until December that a Blue-book appeared in which it was stated for the first time that Mr. Lyttelton had found out that a totally different state of things had been going on, and that the High Commissioner had sanctioned the taking of the law out of the hands of the magistrates of the Colony and its being put into the hands of the mine managers. Mr. Lyttelton said he had no idea of this until Lord Selborne told him of it in October, and nobody who knew Mr. Lyttelton would doubt for a moment that what he said was true. Therefore, if there were no other reason for passing condemnation upon a high official, the fact that he had deliberately allowed his superiors to remain under a false impression in regard to so important a matter was a sufficient ground for condemnation. Great abuses had followed on the flogging. There had been other forms of torture inflicted upon these Chinamen which Lord Milner might not have known about, but for which it was impossible not to hold him responsible. In spite of the injunctions, first of Mr. Lyttelton and then of Lord Elgin, that prosecutions should take place against offenders, not a single prosecution had been instituted. The reason of that, he suggested, was that the persons who would be the chief witnesses were the Chinese themselves, and they were under such a state of intimidation that it was quite impossible for them to give evidence. According to the last Blue-book the Chinese, when called before the Commission of Inquiry ordered by Lord Selborne, were not allowed to give evidence before the Commission except on their knees—a form of proceedings which was calculated to frighten them from giving reliable evidence. The consequences of the illegal treatment of the Chinese did not stop there. The Chinamen were driven into a state of desperation by the treatment they received; they deserted from the mines, and, being forbidden by law from obtaining an honest livelihood, they were driven to commit crimes, and so the unfortunate people of the Transvaal, who had only just recovered from a devastating war, had inflicted upon them the calamity of having their houses broken into, their property taken, and often murders committed by the Chinese. The Attorney-General of the Transvaal, speaking in the Legislative Council in September, stated that up to that time there had been 2,543 convictions, 735 desertions, and 21,205 cases of refusal to work, out of a total of 46,000 Chinamen in the country. Every kind of serious crime was recorded against the Chinamen in the last Blue-book. In one case an unfortunate Dutch farmer was murdered before the eyes of his wife and child, who were both badly injured, and for that crime alone four Chinamen were hanged. At whose door lay the responsibility for this? Then in order to cope with this very serious state of things, a law had been passed which was worse than the first Ordinance, as it was passed for the express purpose of further restricting the liberty of the Chinese, and took away from them even the right of having their offences investigated by the magistrates of the Colony, and set up domestic tribunals, presided over by persons who were not lawyers, to try them under the eyes of the compound managers. What were called collective fines were levied. In the event of a Chinaman not being able to pay the fine inflicted, the gang with whom he worked had to make it up. Anything less consistent with justice, as it was understood in this country, he could not imagine. Perhaps the most sinister part of the whole business was the part played by the Chamber of Mines. It seemed that it was into their hands that the administration of the law was resigned by the high officers of the Crown; and when at last the flogging was stopped, as was said, in June last, it was by a circular of the Chamber of Mines, issued on the 16th June. It was sometimes asserted that Lord Milner's Government was conducted for and by the mineowners. When they found the law taken out of the hands of official persons, and allowed to be administered by the Chamber of Mines, there was very good grounds for the assertion. He hoped the House to-night would make it clear that the state of things that had been revealed would not be allowed to continue, and that when it discovered that one of its servants, however highly placed, had misused his powers, it would interfere with authority to vindicate those principles of freedom, humanity, and justice which were, after all, the most priceless possession of their race.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House expresses its disapproval of the conduct of Lord Milner, as High Commissioner of South Africa and Governor of the Transvaal, in authorising the flogging of Chinese labourers in breach of the Law, in violation of treaty obligations, and without the knowledge or sanction of His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies."—(Mr. Byles.)

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Mr. Speaker, I can hardly think, Sir, of any task more distasteful to a generous mind than that which has been voluntarily undertaken to-night by the two hon. Gentlemen who have preceded me. Of course I accept their own statements that they were animated by the highest and, I will add, a very exceptional sense of public duty. The hon. Gentleman the Member for North Stafford—[Cries of "Salford"]—the hon. Member for North Salford—[AN HON. MEMBER: Do not forget Manchester.] I beg hon. Gentlemen to consider the dignity of the House of Commons. [OPPOSITION cries of "Manners."] I think the hon. Member for North Salford will admit a reluctance in pursuing the duty which he thought had been cast upon him. He said he had no feeling of malignity towards Lord Milner, that he was only impressed by the necessity of vindicating his country's honour. Well, Sir, let me say at once that I believe in the hon. Gentleman's sincerity; but it is a very dangerous thing when private individuals upon whom no great responsibility is cast undertake so great a matter as that of vindicating their country's honour. Sir, I accept the hon. Gentleman's statement absolutely as to his own motives and intentions. I cannot do otherwise; for if, instead of being inspired by these high intentions he had been animated by Party contentions, by what is worse still, by personal and petty spite—if that had been the cause, what could be meaner, what could be more contemptible in any Member of this House than to persecute a great servant of the public, a great official who, in the words of Lord Elgin the other day, the generous words of Lord Elgin, was—

> "One who, during a time of stress and anxiety showed a courage and devotion to his country that his country will not forget."

What, I say, could be more despicable than to attack such a man without the sanction of the highest motive, which the hon. Gentleman claimed for himself, and to persecute him for a single error of judgment—[MINISTERIAL Cries of "No, no!"]—a single error of judgment—in a long course of public service? "No, no," you say. Then for what do you persecute him? [AN HON. MEMBER: Flogging.] The Motion is confined to a single act in a long public life, in a long course of public service. I am not permitted by the rules of the House to go beyond the Resolution, and I am bound to say that the two hon. Gentlemen who have spoken have confined themselves very strictly to this narrow ground; and for a single error of judgment, upon this single point, they ask the House to inflict this humiliation on a most distinguished member of our great Civil Service. What is the proposal? In the absence, the necessary absence, of the person accused—for you have not called him to the Bar of this House—you propose to call on the House to pass a Resolution which can have no practical effect, and to inflict censure and humiliation on this man, of whose existence and work in our history, at any rate, if not, indeed, in this conflict of petty passion, in history, at all events, the people of this country will be proud. You ask the House to pass this censure on a man who is no longer in office and for an error which you admit you know he has frankly acknowledged, and for which he has expressed regret. Where is the generosity? Where is the magnanimity for which we take credit when you can put aside all that you owe to this great and distinguished public servant in order to condemn him, and to inflict this unnecessary humiliation on him after he has himself acknowledged and regretted the error he has committed? The Resolution is retrospective. It is vindictive. Sir, let us have no cant about this matter. We all know, the country knows, that the object of this Motion is to inflict humiliation upon a person who is as honest and as sincere as any Member of this House, but of whose policy hon. Members opposite happen to disapprove; and for that and for Party reasons they pick up a single point in a long history of self-sacrifice and devotion. They pick it up because they have an admission—I am almost disposed to say an unnecessary admission—at all events it is a chivalrous admission — of the person concerned. They dare not question his policy as a whole [Cries of "Oh"], and they pick up the one point, the one little point, a comparatively unimportant point in the whole history of this great man's life. They pick it up because they have his own admission and they cannot be contradicted; and they, accepting his regret, are not satisfied without the additional humiliation which they think they can inflict by a vote of this House, but which will recoil upon the heads of those who have proposed it, and upon those who may be ungenerous enough to support it. Now, Sir, what are the facts? ["Hear, hear."] Yes; I do not wonder hon. Members opposite wish to hear them after the statement that has been made. I know, for I have had a long acquaintance with the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Salford, and I do believe in my heart that he is thoroughly sincere—he means to be accurate—that he would not knowingly impute to even his bitterest opponent anything which ought not to be imputed; but I never heard in my life a statement in which there was more perversion of the true state of the case than the statement we have just heard from the hon Gentleman. He puts in adjectives without apparently any understanding of their importance. He actually declared in this House, when it was not so full as it is at present, that Lord Milner had admitted that he had deliberately broken an engagement undertaken with a foreign nation, and that he had purposely withheld the knowledge of the facts from his Government.

MR. BYLES: I said I understood Lord Milner's own words in the House of Lords to mean that. That is my clear understanding of them. They are not adjectives, but that does not matter. [" Shame."]

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): Order! order! I was put out for saying " Shame " once.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I hate to hear this laughter, whether in my favour or against me. The honour of the public service of the country is at stake. I did not laugh at or interrupt the hon. Gentleman. I most deeply regret the statement he was persuaded to make, and I am going to treat this question seriously in answer to the hon. Gentleman. He understood that to be what Lord Milner meant. But, Sir, he cannot understand English. I am not going to read the whole of the speech, although it is a short one, in which Lord Milner acknowledged his part in this matter with a frankness which every impartial, honourable man will admire, and never, never in the whole course of this controversy has he admitted, or is it possible to suppose, that he purposely deceived the Government which he was serving, that he deliberately did this, that, or the other. In that case, for Heaven's sake, why are not hon. Members consistent?

MR. BYLES asked whether the right hon. Gentleman meant that this was an accident or was it deliberately sanctioned. That was what he wanted to know. He understood Lord Milner to say that he sanctioned the flogging. He made no objection to what Mr. Evans told him he had done. Therefore he took it that it was purposeful, intentional, and deliberate.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: To my mind, and I will give my reasons for it, certainly nothing was less purposeful and deliberate; and again I say I cannot believe the hon. Gentleman in his sober [Laughter]—his serious moments—I am sorry that there should be this disposition to seize upon any possible slip which, in my anxiety to do justice to the subject, I may make—I say I cannot believe the hon. Gentleman in his serious moments can believe that Lord Milner, a great public servant, with whom he says he has been in personal communication, could have deliberately done so outrageous a thing as purposely to deceive his Parliamentary chiefs, and deliberately to do a great wrong which he had subsequently regretted; and I say if that were true hon. Members ought to be consistent. They ought to understand that a charge of that kind cannot be met by the mere censure of the House. It is the most serious thing in the world; and nothing short of an impeachment would justify a charge of that kind. Now let me, at any rate, proceed to give my own version of the facts, as I understand them. Let anyone contradict them afterwards if he thinks I have misunderstood them. When the late Government undertook to sanction the introduction of Chinese labour into South Africa they were guided by what had been done in regard to the employment of foreign labour in other colonies, and they nominated an official as protector of the Chinese, and the duty of this protector was to see that the contract entered into was understood by the labourer, that it was completely carried out, that the coolie was treated with humanity, and that his health, comfort, and general welfare were properly looked after. This was the duty of the official, a duty well known and performed in Mauritius, in the Malay Settlements, in the West Indies, and now in the Transvaal. For this purpose the Government nominated—I am not sure if the appointment was made by the home Government—Mr. Evans, a gentleman who had a most honourable record of, I think, twenty years in the Malay States, who had a high reputation for ability, for integrity, and humanity, who knew the Chinese language, and had been in constant communication with Chinamen in the Malay Straits. I doubt myself whether a better appointment could have been suggested. Now this is the authority for any statement of fact that can be presented to the House, and Mr. Evans himself stated to Mr. Lyttelton that on a definite occasion, in the course of a general conversation, in which, no doubt, many other subjects were dealt with, he had, casually, as it were, told Lord Milner that he had found it necessary to give permission for a certain limited amount of corporal punishment to be inflicted in the mines, and he stated —I forget whether he gave the explanation to Lord Milner—he stated to Mr. Lyttelton that he had done that because in the case of certain offences against discipline he had found that the delay, the necessary delay, in taking the case to the courts and so on, led to serious difficulty and that a trivial matter easily became a serious riot. It was in his opinion necessary that greater discretion should be given to a manager in the case of really trivial offences. That is Mr. Evans's statement, and for the moment I am only repeating it. It is not his statement that Lord Milner carefully and deliberately considered the matter, and there is no record whatever of this taking place. If it took place at all it took place in this casual way in the course of a conversation on many subjects, and Mr. Evans says that Lord Milner took no objection. [" Hear, hear," " He ought to have done so."] Ah, yes, if we were perfect how many are the things we might have done or done better. Lord Milner says, and no doubt everyone will believe his statement, that he has absolutely no recollection of this conversation, but he has no reason whatever to doubt Mr. Evans' integrity or his memory, and therefore he has taken on himself to accept his statement as accurate. I am therefore debarred from going in any particular behind the statement of Mr. Evans. Lord Milner says he has no doubt the conversation took place as Mr. Evans stated, and now he has only to say, " I think I was wrong in not taking notice of this statement; I regret that I did not do so." [" Hear, hear."] Here we are all agreed, that this original permission which Mr. Evans says he reported to Lord Milner was illegal. The hon. Member for Newbury has been kind enough to give me credit for sincerity in my objections to flogging, and therefore he will not be surprised that I say I deeply regret that any official in the colonial or public service should have given this illegal permission which was given by Mr. Evans. I go beyond, and, accepting Lord Milner's statement say also it is very much to be regretted that he failed to notice it, for that is the only charge that is brought against him. Mr. Evans only says, " He took no objection." I very much regret he took no objection, and that in the conversation which passed he did not at once say " No; I cannot listen to anything of the kind." But I also think, in common fairness to Lord Milner, that he was likely to be much less on his guard against a gentleman who was protector of the Chinese, and who, let me say, had been earnest and energetic on all other occasions in protecting the Chinese and was constantly representing their wrongs and grievances, and endeavouring to secure a redress of them. Really, in common fairness, we must admit that Lord Milner would be less on his guard against an evil coming from the protector of the Chinese than he would have been against it coming from any one else. Very shortly after this, and after Lord Milner had left, abuses and outrages on the Chinese were reported to Sir Arthur Lawley, and promptly dealt with by him; he withdrew any permission given, and refused to allow any sort of illegal punishment. May I further remind the House that Mr. Lyttelton, in his position as Secretary of State for the Colonies, the moment the matter was brought to his knowledge, expressed in severe terms his disapproval and his profound regret that anything of the kind had taken place? Now we all regret, Lord Milner himself included, that this incident occurred; and could it not now be allowed to rest? Surely, after such an expression of opinion as appears in the Blue-books by his official superiors, was not that sufficient to vindicate the honour of the country which the hon. Member for North Salford had taken under his special care? It seems to me we ought to be satisfied. When the Motion was put down on the Paper by a private Member naturally my great interest was to know the view the Government were going to take. Did they think the circumstances demanded the censure of a great public servant? I hoped that they would take a very broad view of the situation, and that we might find ourselves in absolute agreement. But an Amendment has been put on the Paper. At an earlier part of the day I think the Under-Secretary for the Colonies complained that I had not been able to give him notice of an Amendment I moved. We have not had much notice. I have much more reason to complain of the action of the Government.

Mr. CHURCHILL: I did not complain of that.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not complain in the least. I say we have only had short notice of this Amendment. Although the hon. Member's Resolution has been on the Paper for a long time, it was only this morning that we learned the particular way in which the Government propose to deal with it. They have put down an Amendment. Sir, it is a cowardly Amendment. I would prefer infinitely the Resolution of the hon. Gentleman. At all events that presents a clear issue. I should vote against it with a light heart, but I should vote against it with some respect for the hon. Gentleman who, with, I think, a mistaken impression of his duty, has put it down in clear terms. But the Amendment! It is an Amendment which insults Lord Milner, and at the same time accepts the substantial part of the Resolution of the hon. Gentleman opposite. They think to gain votes by distinctly pointing at Lord Milner, and at the same time withdrawing his name. That is Party tactics; Liberal policy. Well, I must refrain. But there is something else. What is this "conciliatory" Amendment to do? It is proposed in the interests of "peace and conciliation." It is an Amendment which a politician may accept, but which on its merits would be rejected by every honourable man. This Amendment is entrusted to the hon. Gentleman the Under-Secretary for the Colonies. What is the history—I am speaking of recent events—of the connection of the hon. Gentleman with this matter? The other day he was asked a question on this matter, and from that almost sacrosanct position which he now occupies he described this action of the High Commissioner's as a grave dereliction of public duty. Brave words! [Ministerial cheers.] You agree? [Cries of "Entirely," and "Yes."] Why, do not you see that these brave words have very weak conclusions? There is a man in the very highest position in the public service. He has been guilty in your minds and in the minds of the Government of a grave dereliction of duty, and you are going to be satisfied with an empty Resolution which, if you succeed in passing it, will be treated with contempt by everyone who has the honour to appreciate the services of Lord Milner. You cannot condemn him in terms of this kind without admittedly laying yourselves open to the charge that you do not believe what you say, for if you do believe it you would impeach him.

Mr. CROOKS (Woolwich): I will vote for it if you will move it.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I see hon. Gentlemen below the gangway appreciate the force of my argument. They would impeach him. They have the right to do it. They would repeat the experiment in the case of Warren Hastings at Heaven knows what cost to the country. They would have a great State trial occupying many years. It would end in a verdict of complete acquittal, and probably a subsequent Parliament would pass a most effusive Resolution of gratitude and respect to the person whom they had impeached. I appreciate all that; it is consistent. What I complain of is the policy of the Government. Once more it is what it has been over and over again this session, a policy of contemptible weakness. Those who take this extreme view dare not carry their policy to its logical conclusion. The hon. Gentleman who said Lord Milner had been guilty of a grave dereliction of duty said another thing which astonished me, and is quite new in official procedure. He said Lord Milner had made a Party speech in another place, and that relieved him of any obligation whatever to defend him.† Well, I do not think Lord Milner has lost much. But what a statement! The obligation by honourable and long tradition of great offices to defend any public servant who cannot defend himself. [Cries of "Butler" and "Macdonald."] The obligation to defend any public servant against unjust or excessive censure is an obligation independent altogether of all Party considerations. I deny altogether that the speech made by Lord Milner could, by an impartial person, be considered in any possible sense a Party speech. It was a speech made without any attempt to put pressure on the Government. It accepted the plea of the Government that they must have time to form their conclusions, and it put before the Government what they should be glad to have known—the opinion of a man of great experience and great knowledge upon the subject on which they have to pronounce. To call that a Party speech is a misuse of terms. But, even if it had been a Party speech, I will say that the hon. Gentleman cannot, without a great breach of tradition, absolve himself from that honourable necessity placed upon a political chief to say all that can be said in favour of those who serve the Department with which he is concerned.

† See (4) Debates, clii., 1236.

Mr. CHURCHILL: It is not so.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: It matters very little to such a man—to a man who entertains that view of his own obligations and of Lord Milner's services. I think it is regrettable that, on the present occasion, the representation of the Government should be committed to his hands. I say it is the duty of the head of a Department, whoever he may be, to defend the servants of the Department.

Mr. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Not for reprehensible conduct.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I say it is the duty of the head of the Department to defend the servants of the Crown against unjust censure. I ask this question—Is it just to censure a public servant who has given eight years, the best years, probably, of his life to the service of his country—is it just to condemn him because he has confessed to an error of judgment on a single occasion? Anyway, that is a new idea of official responsibility. [Cries of "No."] Many years ago—I believe it was in the early fifties—there was a Liberal public servant, a diplomatist of great distinction, Sir James Hudson, who was our Minister at Turin, and who made a statement which was held to be, I think by many Liberals, certainly by the Tory Government then in power, of the highest indiscretion, a great mistake of judgment. Attention was called to it in this House, and it fell to Mr. Disraeli, who was then leading the House, to express the opinion of the Government on the subject. He refused to condemn Sir James Hudson, and this is what he said—

> "Great services are not cancelled by one act, by one single error, however it may be regretted at the moment."

And, therefore, although Sir James Hudson was a political opponent and was known to be a strong adherent of the Liberal cause, Mr. Disraeli in those old days—we are much superior now—had the generosity to defend his political opponent for the reason I have given. Is there not even more reason in the case of Lord Milner? Will the House allow me to try and bring before them the nature of the work which is imposed upon High Commissioners, Viceroys, and Governors of Crown Colonies throughout the Empire? These men are in a way autocrats, and that brings upon them all the disadvantages which autocrats have to suffer. They are responsible for everything, be it great or be it small, in the administration with which they are connected. They are answerable for the security of the possessions for which they are made responsible. They are answerable for order, for legislation, for every detail of administration, for every act, be it great or small, of every member, be he important or otherwise, of the whole administration. For all these things these men are, technically, at any rate, responsible to their Departments and to this House of Commons. They are not infallible. How can you expect to get infallible administrators under such circumstances? I do not believe they are to be found anywhere, but certainly you do not offer much temptation. I have never heard of any one in the colonial service who in these trying positions, having to submit, as he has to do, to this sort of ignorant and irresponsible criticism on the part of people who have none of his responsibility, has become a gold magnate, who has made a fortune, who has even been able to provide for those whom he has left behind him, by devotion to the public service, by his interest in the great work he is conducting from the highest motives. These men, some of them never rising to a great position, others occupying positions of the greatest responsibility, have continued to serve the country, and now you are placing a slight on the whole service in the person of one of its most distinguished representatives—Lord Milner. It is admitted that before he occupied his position in South Africa Lord Milner had done great service to the State—and that is to be considered—he had done great service to the Party opposite. But I put that aside. His great service to the country are his services in South Africa. During a great part of that time he was in a sense responsible to me, and as my colleague and friend a greater man I have never known. I have never known even a great man who did not make mistakes. This man has given his life, he has risked his health, he has lived under conditions which very few in this House would be willing to sustain. Eight hours a day! Why eighteen hours a day of continuous brain work very often fell to his lot. He has had to deal with the Administration in the Cape Colony under great stress and anxiety, in the Transvaal under circumstances of still greater difficulty, and during the whole of that time he has shown an ability, courage, and firmness that ought to commend itself to men who appreciate bravery at a time when his life might have been so much easier if he had shown weakness. Hon. Members opposite may not agree with him, but I appeal with confidence to them to admire the character which he showed in difficult circumstances. And if they disagree with him for that, they cannot condemn him. His policy was my policy as long as I was in the Office. It was Mr. Lyttelton's policy when he succeeded me. They ought not to blame him. We were satisfied with all that he did and we take the reponsibility for every action which we have not officially condemned. It is we who ought to be the subject of their censure if they think we are deserving of it. In a debate which took place a day or two ago, I was struck by a speech delivered by Lord Stanmore. He is, I believe, a strong Liberal, and a most distinguished official. He has occupied the highest offices in many of our Crown Colonies, and he has been Governor of some of the most important possessions of the Crown. Lord Stanmore upon this matter expressed sympathy with Lord Milner. He went further. He expressed his belief that he himself and every Governor had at some time or another on their own responsibility committed the same error of violating the strict letter of the law. Well, hon. Members opposite will not stop it by absurd Resolutions of this kind. They will only stop it when they can make human nature perfect. I do not go so far as Lord Stanmore. I occupied my position for eight years and I am not aware of any violations even of the spirit of the law. But there were very few Governors in my time—and I was fortunate enough to have the most splendid public servants in that capacity—who did not at one time or another make serious mistakes. Well, I want this House to consider the subject from that intimate point of view. Here is this colonial service of ours, which is known and admired throughout the world for its absolute integrity, its freedom from corruption, its ability, its humanity. It is only by these extraordinary qualities that what I may call the daily miracle of the successful administration of the British Empire is continuously carried on. But for them, how would it be possible for these two small islands of ours to administer so large a portion of the earth's surface and with so much distinction and general satisfaction? Sir, I ask the House to put aside every other consideration but that of their Imperial duty, the duty which they cannot escape, even those who least sympathise with the work, be they Irish, Scottish, or English, and look to those great considerations and principles which have made this Colonial Service what it undoubtedly is. I ask them to recognise the merits of this service; and I ask them to appreciate the difficulties under which every member of it lies, and not to discourage them when one of them has committed a mistake which he himself has freely acknowledged. I ask them not to discourage the whole service by harsh criticism of one of its most distinguished members. I hope the House will reject this Amendment. If I may venture to advise my friends I would say that our course is clear. When the Motion is put after the Amendment of the Government has been proposed it will be in the form that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question. I shall vote against that. In so doing I am voting against the Resolution. I shall vote against the Resolution as a whole, and I shall vote against it in part; I shall vote against it in every possible way. If the Amendment is not carried then the Resolution will be put in its entirety and I shall vote against that. If the Amendment of the Government is carried and put as the substantive Motion, I shall then vote against it, as worse indeed, because it is more dishonest, than the Motion. I hope the House will treat this as a question rather outside ordinary political questions, and that it will reject both the Amendment and the Resolution. But if it does not, if it accepts either, if it is carried, in that case I shall rely upon the Parliament of the future whose advent will be quickened by this ill-treatment of one of our great officials—I rely upon the future Parliament to do what Parliaments have done in the past more than once, namely, to repair, tardily it may be, a great injustice and to expunge from our records a Resolution which, if it ever be placed there, will be a disgrace to them.

*Mr. CHURCHILL: Mr. Speaker, I rise to-day for the second time to follow the right hon. Member for West Birmingham, but I hope I shall not be drawn by that association into imitating or attempting to imitate the protracted, superlative, and, I think, rather laboured exhibition of contempt with which he has occupied the attention of the House. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman has heaped contempt and contumely upon my hon. friend the Member for North Salford, and upon the Motion which he has placed upon the Paper. The right hon. Gentleman has used even stronger, or, if it had been in his power, he would have used even stronger, expressions against the Amendment which I have placed on the Paper by the direction of the Prime Minister, and which enjoys the support of those who give him their sympathy and act with him. He described that Amendment as base, cowardly, and dishonest. Then, at least, I hope I may ask for a special measure of the indulgence of the House in order to say anything that may be said in support of a course which has been subjected to such very severe condemnation. I would ask the House to clear their minds of the fierce and bitter elements which the right hon. Gentleman has been the first to introduce into this discussion. I hope the House will try to give a fair consideration to the view which His Majesty's Government desire to submit for their consideration. The Motion which the hon. Member for North Salford has placed on the Paper embodies a proposition, the truth of which I venture to think very few on this side of the House would care to dispute. It has been moved with sincerity and good feeling in speeches of much ability, delivered under great restraint. But I observe that other Amendments have been placed on the Paper during the period that the Motion of the hon. Member has been set forth, and I think that, when divergent views are expressed by Members of the same Party, it would be unbecoming in the Government—and I said something like this last session—to sit silent and refuse to give any clear or direct guidance to the House. Even on a private Members' night, when a Motion of so unusual a character is brought forward, it is the duty of the Government to offer its counsel to the House. We need not lose any time in disputing about the main facts of this case. They have been forcibly repeated to us to-night. We have the admission of Lord Milner that he permitted his subordinate to authorise the illegal flogging of Chinese labourers. We know that, in consequence, flogging was inflicted on a large scale and during several months; we know that that permission was abused, as all permission to administer flogging without the restrictive regulation of the law will infallibly be abused; and we know that actual cruelty and outrage resulted. We know that this was a distinct breach of the treaty obligations which this country had contracted with a Foreign Power, and we know that all the while the Secretary of State in this House, and the Under-Secretary in the other House, were occupied in giving Parliament assurances that nothing of the sort was going on or could possibly go on. Any one who reads the Blue-book will see the facts put forward on the authority of Lord Selborne. I have never been one of those who used the exact term of slavery in characterising the Chinese Labour Ordinance. But I say that, in face of the abuses that grew up from this wicked permission, there has arisen a state of things which makes it impossible to wonder that persons should have been carried away by honest indignation to use the strongest language of condemnation about such a system. If Gentlemen on the other side of the House have suffered from such controversial attacks, all I can say is that the responsibility which they have accepted throughout, and which even to-night they are anxious to assume, convinces me that they have received no more than they deserved. When I was asked in the course of a conversation a week ago to express an opinion on Lord Milner's share in the transaction, I said that I believed his action constituted a grave dereliction of public duty and an undoubted infringement of the law †; and that, I had thought, was the opinion of all of us. Can anyone dispute the fact that for a public officer to authorise illegal flogging is to infringe the law? Can any one deny that an infringement of the law by an officer especially charged to maintain and administer the law is a direct dereliction of public duty? Such an expression of opinion on behalf of the Minister who is for the time being charged with the duty of representing a public department was not merely legitimate but necessary. Most of all is it necessary in the case of the Colonial Office. Under the Secretary of State for the Colonies there are thirty or forty officers of high rank administering under different forms and varying conditions as many separate and distinct provinces, comprising a population of something like 30,000,000 of human beings of many races, creeds, and of almost every colour. To the Secretary of State all these important officers are responsible; and it is from the expressions which the Secretary of State, as the servant of this House, may use that these officers all over the world must be guided in the character of their administration and in the manner in which they discharge their responsibilities to all these many races over whom our authority is exercised. So far from withdrawing or minimising in any way the words which I then used on behalf of and with the assent of the Secretary of State and His Majesty's Government, I can only say that in spite of any difference of opinion entertained on the opposite side of the House, I believe these words amounted to a very fair and very reasonable and proper judgment on the transaction that has taken place. But now we are invited to take a much graver step. We are invited to place a formal censure on the journals of the House. Many hard things have been said rightly or wrongly and in different times about many persons through the mouths of Ministers of the Crown. Very few Motions of this character have ever been placed on the journals of the House. While I do not disagree in any way with the terms of the Motion as stated by my hon. friend, while I admit its truth and admire its moderation, while the Government have no intention whatever of disparaging the motives which induced the hon. Member to place it on the Paper, yet we do dispute the wisdom and the convenience of procedure which he has adopted, and we do most gravely doubt the practical utility of the step which the House is now asked to take. There are certain objections to passing this Motion in its present form which will readily occur to any one who considers the subject. In the first place the offence was committed under another Government and a different House of Commons. It is, I think, clear from what we have heard to-night that had it been brought to the notice of the other House of Commons it would have received a much more lenient consideration than it does at the hands of the new House of Commons. I admit that there is something of the flavour of retrospective retribution in a new House of Commons going back upon events which have happened under the auspices and the authority of its predecessor. Secondly, it is I think contrary to usage and to right feeling to censure a man unheard. It is true that as Lord Milner is a peer of Parliament we have no authority to bring him to our bar unless he desires to come; but this Motion does not give him the chance or the option of coming. We have, of course, Lord Milner's admissions contained in the Blue-book. We have moreover his statement and expression of regret which he made in another place†; but although these statements and admissions establish Lord Milner's acceptance of responsibility for a breach of the law, through which disastrous consequences resulted, I cannot help thinking that just-minded men, and I am sure my hon. friend, would say that before taking the serious step of placing this Resolution on the journals of the House we should examine much more closely the circumstances attending the giving of this permission, not indeed for the purposes of clearing the noble Lord concerned from the charge of having condoned wrong, or from the charge of having accepted the responsibility of wrong—for that is beyond dispute, and the right hon. Gentleman himself did not attempt to dispute it—but for the purpose of ascertaining how far really he was cognisant of what was taking place, and how far he realised to what excesses and improprieties his subordinate was committing him. I do not wish to try and put some measure of blame on Mr. Evans; but I am bound to say that after a severe examination of Mr. Evans on the subject at the Colonial Office by Mr. Lyttelton his memory appeared to be singularly unretentive on several important points. He could not remember how, where, when, and in what terms this all-important permission had been given, or how he had conveyed it to those in charge of Chinese coolies. In so far as he referred to memoranda and records his statements, so far from being confirmed, were upset. So doubtful and vague were his statements on the subject that Mr. Lyttelton thought it to be his duty to write to Lord Milner and ask whether, in view of the vagueness of Mr. Evans's statements, he could persist in his acceptance of responsibility for these transactions. Lord Milner, after careful consideration, proceeded to accept the responsibility of the statements made; and he gave an account to the House of Lords which not merely took the form of the statement that he accepted responsibility, but which purported to be almost a summary, or, at all events, a report of the conversation he had had with Mr. Evans—an account which is so far conclusive that, as the right hon. Gentleman himself has said, we cannot for a moment attempt to go behind it. I do not attempt to go behind Lord Milner's acceptance of responsiblity. It is quite impossible for us in this House to attempt to do so; and yet I say there is just that element of doubt as to his real moral responsibility for the grave circumstances of this case which I think must tend somewhat to mitigate and also somewhat to suspend the severity of our judgment. But, whether or not, I say without hesitation that it would be peculiar and unprecedented if we were, after only three hours debate, without hearing the person principally concerned, unfortified by the report of a Committee, to record our censure on the noble Lord in terms so solemn and unusual that they have only been employed, I think, twice in the last 100 years. And what about Lord Milner himself? Lord Milner's career has comprised three distinct spheres of activity — Egypt, the Treasury during the famous Death Duties Budget, and South Africa during these last eight lamentable years. With regard to the first of these fields, I suppose there would be no disposition to pass censure in any quarter of the House. With regard to the last two, various opinions are and will be held as between the great political Parties. But I do not think it can fairly be denied in any part of the House that in all these three important sets of public affairs, Lord Milner has worked, according to his lights, strenuously, faithfully, and disinterestedly. Still less can it be denied that during the long period covered by these events, he has played a part which must leave its imprint, for good or for ill, extensively upon the pages of history. I have carefully refrained from passing either censure or eulogy on all or any of these events, not because I am without opinions which at other times I may think or have thought it proper to express—I trust with sufficient clearness—but because I think it would be impossible for us to do justice to his conduct either in the one direction or the other within the compass of a three hours debate, and because I am quite certain it is impossible for the House within such a period to make even a superficial examination of such matters. I mention them for one purpose, and for one purpose alone—to submit to the House that they are very grave matters, which will be talked of for a very long time, and that they lie wholly in the past. Lord Milner has gone from South Africa, probably for ever. The public service knows him no more. Having exercised great authority he now exerts no authority. Having held high employment he now has no employment. Having disposed of events which have shaped the course of history, he is now unable to deflect in the smallest degree the policy of the day. Having been for many years, or at all events for many months, the arbiter of the fortunes of men who are "rich beyond the dreams of avarice," he is to-day poor, and I will add, honourably poor. After twenty years of exhausting service under the Crown he is to-day a retired Civil servant, without pension or gratuity of any kind whatever. [OPPOSITION cries of "Shame."] If it is a shame, there [pointing to the Front OPPOSITION Bench] is where the responsibility lies for any neglect. But I do seriously say to my hon. friend, "Is it worth while to pursue him any further?" There is—[Interruption which was unheard in the gallery]—Really, I must ask the right hon. Member for Croydon to practice a little more courtesy in his demeanour—There is another consideration to which I desire to draw the attention of the House. This new House of Commons is full of earnest, purposeful and vehement men. Let them not overlook or underrate the vexation and mortification which must be experienced by any vehement and earnest man who sees the ideals, the principles, the policies for which he has toiled utterly discredited—[OPPOSITION cries of "By whom?"]—by the people of Great Britain—and who knows that many of the arrangements in which he has consumed all the energies of his life are about to be reversed or dissolved. Lord Milner has ceased to be a factor in public events. Let my hon. friends beware that with the ever ready aid of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham he may not be recreated. Mr. Speaker, I think that great Parties should endeavour to avoid conflicts with private persons. My hon. and learned friend the Member for South Donegal, who asked me the other day whether we proposed to strike the name of Lord Milner from the Privy Council, no doubt is prepared to support that course with instances from that accurate constitutional knowledge for which he is noted. About twenty years ago there came into power a Government not indeed supported by a majority so large as that upon which we rely, but still a Government not inferior in elements of strength and stability to any other of modern times. That Government was carried away by its exultation of victory and its pride of strength to embark upon what I must call the persecution of a political opponent. The House knows well, the Irish Members particularly know well, how this mood of intolerance led that powerful Government to the Parnell Commission, to the infamous Parnell Commission, as I shall call it. And what was the result? What was the advantage which that Government reaped in the end? That great Party was covered with confusion and shame as the result of the course which they followed, and the man against whom all their power was directed was raised high in public esteem and popularity. Great cities conferred their freedom upon Mr. Parnell. He received on every side manifestations of public respect. The cause for which he was fighting was greatly advanced. [AN HON. MEMBER on the MINISTERIAL Benches: But he was innocent.] I do not for one moment want to institute any exact comparison between the circumstances of that case and the case with which we are now called upon to deal. I do say that in the one case upon the specific fact alleged, Lord Milner is clearly guilty, and in the other case upon the specific fact alleged that Mr. Parnell was proved to be unjustly accused. But the moral which I draw from the Parnell affair—a moral which, I think, may be drawn also from the conflict of the House of Commons with Mr. Bradlaugh in 1880—is that it is never worth while for a great Party to pursue a private person, and least of all when that private person happens also to be a political opponent. If we were a political Party clutching precariously at power it might be worth while to strike a blow at a prominent political opponent. But we have won so completely that the very ideas and forces to which we were opposed seem to have melted away as if they had never been. As we have triumphed, so we may be merciful; as we are strong, so we can afford to be generous. There are transactions in the government of States about which people may hold strong opinions, but which it may be much wiser, in the tolerance of overwhelming victory, deliberately to consign to silence and oblivion. I frankly own that I should not press these considerations on the House if the range of the Motion and the Amendment we are discussing was confined to this House, or even to this country. The Colonial Office deals with many questions which are almost as critical and almost as perilous as any questions with which the Foreign Office is concerned. But whereas the Foreign Office is increasingly regarded as outside the scope of Party politics, the Colonial Office lies in the heart and centre of the fiercest partisanship and controversy. It is inevitable, in view of what has occurred in South Africa, that the people should follow with the keenest attention events that take place in a land for which they have sacrificed and suffered so much. I do not complain. On the contrary, the Government are prepared to assert the right of the House of Commons to be consulted on all matters affecting the Colonies which may be said to involve in their largest and truest sense Imperial interests. But the situation in South Africa is difficult and complex. For its difficulty and complexity we are not responsible. We have succeeded to a legacy of financial, social, and racial confusion. There, on that bench, are the testators of evil. And, sir, what an inheritance! A country struggling back to civilization after being laid waste by fire and sword, with all the after consequences of rebellion and civil war, a great army from over the seas mobilised for immediate war, a ponderous constabulary, a costly and not too efficient nominated and imported bureaucracy, the great industries on which the development of the country depends all resting on an essentially unnatural, unhealthy, and unstable basis—in all this vicious tangle no circumstance of first importance can be discerned for which we on this side of the House are responsible. But we have got to face them all, and surely we have got difficulties enough without going out of the way to find them. [OPPOSITION ironical cheers.] Do not let hon. Gentlemen on this side be misled by those derisive cries, which, let me say, do very little honour to the Party, the Imperial Party, which, on every occasion for the last ten years, has been swift to impute want of patriotism to those who might not wholly share their views. When we have so many real things to do which must be done in the present and in the future, why cannot we leave the past alone? I feel it my duty to say to the House to-night that we believe, having some access to information of authority, that this Motion, if accepted, would undoubtedly aggravate social and racial animosity in South Africa, and that it would have the effect of increasing any tension which may unhappily exist there without any really effective purpose, or without securing in return any substantial advantage to Parliament or to this country. For 100 years South Africa has been divided by the quarrels of two white races, who are equally intolerant of each other, in a land where they are almost equally balanced. The noble Lord who is the subject of this Motion has played the chief part in the climax of that long and bitter duel; he has left behind him in South Africa many friends and partisans, and many foes. If the House of Commons takes the extreme step of passing a formal vote of censure upon that officer, one party in South Africa will be affronted, the other party in South Africa will be exultant. Every demonstration of hostility against Lord Milner on the one hand will be followed by a counter demonstration in his favour on the other—not because of any violent opinion which is entertained on account of the treatment of these Chinese labourers, but because Lord Milner has been the central figure in the tremendous events of the last eight years in South Africa. And I do say that we, who have the real difficulties of this problem thrust upon us day after day, should be incurring a grave responsibility if we lent ourselves to any circumstances or manifestation, however desirable, which had the effect of inflaming anew the bitter passions by which South Africa is racked. It is not my fault that I have been called upon to trespass so much on the good nature of the House to-day. I must ask the House to remember that a very great part of the machinery of public expression in these colonies is controlled by hands none too friendly to the present Government, or to the present majority in the House of Commons. The people out there only hear the worst of us; day after day, all South Africa that reads English is taught to believe that we do not care what happens to them, that we are anxious to ruin their material prosperity, and hon. Gentlemen opposite lend themselves readily to that business. But the Government has no such intentions or desires. We seek the material prosperity of the Transvaal, and of South Africa, we seek it not less earnestly because we believe that material prosperity can never be secured while it stands on a foundation which is unhealthy or unnatural. We desire to act fairly by both the great races in South Africa; we desire to labour, so far as opportunity and power may be given us, to effect a permanent settlement of that country in the interests of that country, and without any desire to secure any Party advantage by any particular treatment of the question in this way or in that. The Government nourish large designs for the establishment of Parliaments and the reconciliation of races, and there is no room in those designs for any exact or pedantic meting out of proper doses of justice to individuals concerned in the tragic events of the past. This Parliament has rightly aspired and has rightly claimed to exert an influence upon the course of politics which shall be intimate, immediate, and direct. No other Parliament in modern times has put forward that claim. Often the House of Commons can only speak words; to night it is enabled to take substantial and definite action; to night, by carrying the Amendment which we have placed on the Paper, by showing that we at any rate are prepared to set an example in saying, "Let bygones be bygones," the House of Commons can send a message to South Africa which cannot be perverted, misrepresented, or misunderstood—a message of comfort to a troubled people, a message of tolerance and conciliation to warring races, a message, indeed, of good hope to the Cape. It is for these reasons which I have endeavoured to set before the House that His Majesty's Government have placed on the Paper the Amendment which I now have the honour to move.

"To leave out from the word 'House' to the end of the Question, and insert the words 'while recording its condemnation of the flogging of Chinese coolies in breach of the law, desires, in the interests of peace and conciliation in South Africa, to refrain from passing censure upon individuals'"—(Mr. Churchill)—instead thereof."

Mr. Churchill.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope the House will allow me in a very brief speech to make some comments on the extraordinary utterance which we have just had in explanation of the policy of the Government. The Under-Secretary for the Colonies began his speech with an air, I thought, of considerable self-satisfaction by saying that he was not going to imitate what he regarded as the policy of some of his predecessors on this bench, but was going, as he expressed it, to give clear and direct guidance to the House. Let the House compare the Amendment in which he proposes to give clear and direct guidance with the speech in which he has recommended that Amendment. In the first part of that speech the hon. Gentleman, lapsing into an unwonted mood, I think, of justice to the man who is the subject of debate to-night, said he thought it would not be proper that Lord Milner should be condemned without being heard; there were circumstances which had come to his knowledge in his department connected with all this transaction which deserved the attentive consideration of those who desired to pass censure on Lord Milner, and in his opinion that was a ground for not passing the Resolution of the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Salford. But then he went on to say that he agreed with the hon. Gentleman the Member for North Salford, and that there was nothing in the Resolution from which he differed; and I would further point out the fact that in the Amendment which the Government have put forward there is something about the interests of peace and conciliation in South Africa, but there is not one word connected with justice to the individual who is being attacked. What is the meaning of that part of the hon. Gentleman's speech in which he said that Lord Milner should be heard, if he really agrees with the Member for North Salford? If he thinks the censure of Lord Milner would be in these circumstances an injustice to Lord Milner, why does not that appear in the Government Amendment? What are we to say of a Government who admit that the Resolution before the House is unjust unless the person who is the subject of it is heard, and who move an Amendment in which that point is absolutely ignored? Then the hon. Gentleman talked about the responsibilities of himself and his colleagues, which, no doubt, are great, in connection with the whole of South African policy, and he said that Lord Milner had friends in South Africa as well as enemies. For my own part, from what I have seen of what has recently passed in this country, if I were Lord Milner there is no Boer I would not prefer as my enemy to some of the Gentlemen who attack him in this country while saying they do not attack the individual, but only the official, whatever that may mean. I do not know what the distinction may be worth. What does the whole argument of the Under-Secretary amount to but this, that they know that for years those who speak our language and who are loyal to our State have regarded Lord Milner as one of the greatest props and one of the greatest supports the British cause has ever had in that country? They may be wrong, but they think so. It is because the Government are afraid of Lord Milner's friends in South Africa, not because that they disagree with the Resolution—they say they agree with it—but because they are afraid of Lord Milner's friends in South Africa they abandon the Resolution and substitute the Amendment. There may be many Gentlemen on both sides of the House who are far more experienced in the affairs of South Africa than I am; but for my own part, if I were an Englishman living in South Africa, I should be able to see uncommonly little difference between the Resolution backed up by the speeches of the mover and the seconder on the one hand, and the Amendment backed up by the speech of the Under-Secretary on the other. So far as I am concerned I should in those circumstances say that this was an attack on a great citizen, who has done great work for the Empire, and I should infinitely prefer the speeches of the mover and the seconder to the insulting protection accorded to him by His Majesty's Government. The Under-Secretary has made an appeal to the hon. Gentleman below the gangway to withdraw his Resolution on these grounds. He said Lord Milner was a great man. Where is he now? He did wield great power. What is he now compared with hon. Gentlemen below the gangway? He had authority once. That authority has been taken away. He appealed to the Member for North Salford not to recreate him. I do not know whether the hon. Member for North Salford has the power to recreate many Lord Milners, but if he has, I hope he will exercise that beneficent power in the interests of the Empire. I think the Under-Secretary, and I think the House, have rather forgotten that they are arrogating to themselves the position of an historical judge. They are not dealing with an official, but with a man who is no longer an official. They are dealing with transactions that are over. They are attempting to record an historical judgment, and it is in the interests of the House itself, certainly not in the interests of Lord Milner, that I would earnestly beg them to reject with equal contempt the original Motion and the Amendment of the Government by which the Government have attempted to make these proceedings palatable to Lord Milner's friends in South Africa. Do let the House remember that Lord Milner's career, whether they approve or disapprove of it, was a long career and a great career, and whatever our judgment may be upon it, no human being with the smallest conception of facts can doubt that, at all events, it was a great career and a long career. Is it wise for this House to look back on that career and pass upon it one single judgment connected with one single event? Of this great career is the House to find nothing better to say than this:—

> "Mr. Byles, South Africa (High Commissioner),—That this House expresses its disapproval of the conduct of Lord Milner, as High Commissioner of South Africa and Governor of the Transvaal, in authorising the flogging of Chinese labourers in breach of the law, in violation of treaty obligations, and without the knowledge or sanction of His Majesty's Secretary of State for the Colonies."

Is that to be the solitary notice which we are going to put in the journals of the House with regard to these great transactions in which Lord Milner's part has been insignificant neither in amount nor of a kind which can move the contempt or disapproval of any critic, to whatever Party he belongs? This House is all powerful in dealing with the present. With the past it has no more to do than any other historical critic. Do not let us to-night sully the pages of our journals by making it appear that this is all that a great representative assembly can say about one of the most eminent servants which this country ever possessed, while they are silent about all the more important passages in his career; do not let it be said that one indefensible blunder and one alone, not carrying with it great consequences, soon remedied, not in any way connected with the great lines of policy which it was his business to deal with—that that incident and that incident alone,is to be selected and have the honour of mention in the journals of the House. It is not for Gentlemen below the gangway on that side or on this, for any Gentleman on this front bench, or any Gentleman on the other front bench, to create or recreate Lord Milner. Such men are the rare fruits of the great political education which this country, whatever else may be said of it, has been able to give to her sons in such measure that no nation in the world can compare with it in its production of great public servants fitted to carry out the work of the nation in every part of the world. Lord Milner is among those servants one of the greatest; and it is in the interests of this House chiefly that I beg it to reject the Resolution which has been put down upon the Paper by the hon. Gentleman below the gangway, to reject that with the respect which we owe to strong convictions, however narrow may be the view taken of the events with which they deal, but to reject with not less decision the far more contemptible Amendment avowedly and openly moved by His Majesty's Government, not because they are zealous for justice, not because they are anxious to protect the individual, not because they have any regard for the great service of the Crown, but for no better reason than that they are afraid of our own countrymen in South Africa. The course which is suggested by the hon. Gentleman below the gangway is, I think, narrow and objectionable. The course suggested by the right hon. Gentleman has every defect suggested in the Resolution of the hon. Member, and it is, in addition to that, utterly mean and utterly contemptible. Let the House reject one and the other and show itself worthy to judge of the history of its own country.

*Mr. RUFUS ISAACS (Reading) proceeded to refer to the speeches which had been made.

Mr. G. H. Williamson (Worcester) rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put," but Mr. Speaker withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

*Mr. RUFUS ISAACS said that the speeches which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of London could only have the effect of showing how much they had failed to appreciate the force of the argument which had been used by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham himself. What this House was asked to do was to express its condemnation of the flogging of Chinese coolies in South Africa. Did hon. Members opposite approve of flogging? If they did not, they were logically bound to support that portion of the Motion which condemned it.

Mr. Byles rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put," but Mr. Speaker withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

*Mr. RUFUS ISAACS said a second Question was whether hon. Members desired to forward the interests of peace and conciliation.

Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

Question put, "That those words be there inserted."

LORD TWEEDMOUTH AND CHINESE LABOUR.

The EARL of DONOUGHMORE: My Lords, seeing the noble Lord the First Lord of the Admiralty in his place, I would like, with your Lordships' permission, to put to him a Question of which I have given him private notice, namely, to ask whether the account, at page 7 of The Times of March 21st last, of a speech delivered by him at the Hotel Great Central, Marylebone Road, on the previous evening is correct in attributing to him the statement that "the Chinaman did not, as was claimed by the late Government, come to South Africa of his own free will;" and to ask, if this account is incorrect, in what way it should be corrected.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord TWEEDMOUTH): My

Lords, the report from which my noble friend quotes is not a verbatim one, and a negative has got into it which absolutely reverses my intended meaning. The passage that the noble Lord quoted should have read—

> "The Chinaman, it was claimed by the late Government, came to South Africa of his own free will, and in future, when in South Africa, if he wished to go back and had not the money in his own pocket, this country would find it for him. That removed some of the taint attached to the system."

I stated that the late Government had said that they secured to the Chinaman a free choice of going to South Africa, and my argument simply was this, that the present Government had complemented that, and affirmed it, and strengthened it by also making it perfectly open to the Chinaman, when he got to South Africa and found what his conditions of labour were, to return to China if he wished, and I said that if he had not the money to return at his own expense this country was prepared to find it. In order to confirm the statement I have just made I may quote from another newspaper, which gave what I said in this way—

> "Not only did the Chinaman go to South Africa of his own free will, but in future, if he wished to go back and had not the money, we in this country would find the money for him."

THE SOUTH AFRICAN INQUIRY.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of ELGIN): My Lords, I have to inform the House that the Committee which is to proceed to South Africa has now been appointed. The members will be Sir West Ridgeway, who will be chairman, Lord Sandhurst, Sir Francis Hopwood, and Colonel Johnston. I propose to have laid on the Table the letter of instructions to the Committee.

THE STANDING ORDERS.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of ONSLOW): My Lords, it has been the practice to confine the Committee of Selection to four Peers besides the Chairman of Committees. I have often felt that that is rather a small number, and that it would be desirable to add to the Committee a certain number of Peers who are accustomed to work on Private Bill Committees and also the Leaders on both sides of the House, for I think it is very desirable that they should be made acquainted with the services which noble Lords render upon Select Committees, as to which now I think a great deal of ignorance prevails. I therefore ask your Lordships to amend the Standing Orders, and in due course I shall move to add a certain number of noble Lords to the Committee of Selection. I beg to move that the Motion standing in my name be agreed to.

Moved, that the Standing Orders be amended as follows: 97. The Chairman of Committees and such other Lords as shall be named by the House shall be appointed a Committe to select and propose to the House the names of the five Lords to form a Select Committee for the consideration of each opposed Local Bill or Provisional Order Confirmation Bill, and shall appoint the Chairman of such Committee, and shall name the Bill or Bills which shall be taken into consideration on the first or any later day of meeting of such Committee. If a vacancy occur in any such Select Committee in the interval between any two sittings of the House, the Chairman of Committees may appoint a Lord to fill such vacancy, and in such case shall report the same to the House at the next sitting—(The Earl of Onslow.)

On Question, Motion agreed to. Standing Order amended accordingly to be printed as amended (No. 34.)

PUBLIC HEALTH ACTS (AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.].

[SECOND READING.]

*LORD HYLTON: My Lords, in asking you to give a Second Reading to this Bill I shall not detain your Lordships long, for it is in the main the same Bill that your Lordships passed last year after it had been referred to a Select Committee. The two principal objects of the Bill are (1) to promote and encourage the construction of suitable dwellings of a certain type for the working classes, cottages that are detached or semi-detached, and to free them from some very onerous and, I think I may almost say, tyrannical conditions which, originally intended and suitable for the crowded streets of cities, are now imposed on anyone building cottages of any kind in totally rural districts; and (2) to attempt to provide a solution, easy, cheap, and expeditious, in cases where difficulties arise between would-be builders and local authorities as to the construction, meaning, and interpretation of the by-laws. At present there is no such means of a friendly or amicable solution, and the consequence is that a considerable amount of litigation has taken place all over the country, and a great deal of public and private money has been needlessly wasted and consequent friction and ill-feeling has been caused.

Twelve months ago the question might, I think, have been fairly asked whether there was any demand for legislation of this kind; whether the grievances which it hopes to meet were of such a character that legislation was necessary; whether the existing building by-laws did, as a matter of fact, check, hinder, and stop building in rural districts; and whether public and private funds were being wasted and frittered away in unnecessary litigation in the matter. But I think that since the debate which took place last year in this House on the Bill that I then had the honour of introducing, and especially since the publication of the evidence that was given before the Select Committee, there cannot be any difficulty in answering all those questions in the affirmative; and I should like, on behalf of the supporters of this Bill and those who feel interested in these topics, to take this opportunity of expressing our best thanks to the noble Marquess the late Leader of this House for having granted that Select Committee, whose evidence has enabled the public to see how widespread and almost universal in country districts are the evils of which I have complained.

With reference to that point, perhaps your Lordships will allow me to refer to the report of the special committee appointed by the Central Chamber of Agriculture to deal with the question of rural building by-laws, which was presented to the Council of the Central Chamber of Agriculture on February 6th last. The committee stated that they had held seven meetings, that they had examined a number of witnesses, and that they would have carried the inquiry much further but for the evidence that was given before the Select Committee of your Lordships' House last year. The committee added that they were deeply impressed by the magnitude of the interests at stake, and that to encourage the erection of cheap and suitable dwellings we required a great deal of elasticity, a quality not to be found in the existing by-laws. They stated that on the proper lodging of the agricultural population depended to a great extent the solution of the problem of the migration of the agricultural population to towns. I think that such evidence from a totally independent body, and one so important, will carry some weight with your Lordships.

Lord Hylton.

I quoted a great number of cases last year from different parts on the country in which specific grievances occurred, and I have no intention of wearying your Lordships by travelling over the same ground again. I quoted instances where by-laws forbade any materials being used for buildings except brick and stone. As your Lordships may perhaps be aware in many villages in Wiltshire there are excellent cottages built of chalk. This provision would have ruled such cottages out. It would have ruled out any attempt at utilising cement and other material. It would have ruled out all the wooden cottages of the south of England. In fact, the only materials in many cases allowed—they make no exception whatever—are brick and stone. Then, again, I quoted to your Lordships cases where cottages were not allowed to be built because the plans indicated that in one or two bedrooms the mathematical proportion of the window space to the floor space did not correspond to what was laid down in the building by-laws; and the result—the very absurd result—of that was that by reducing the size of the bedrooms in the intended cottages they would comply with the by-laws, whereas if they were left larger and better bedrooms, as intended by the builders, they would not comply, and sanction was refused. There are also cases where plans have been rejected because at every point of the ceiling of the attic rooms, by six inches, or even perhaps by so minute a quantity as three inches, the height did not correspond to what was indicated in the by-laws. These cases I brought before your Lordships last year as showing the great difficulties with regard to the present by-laws, and that they all tended to increase the expense of building.

In bringing forward this measure I do not urge it on your Lordships' acceptance from the point of view of the landowners and builders. I urge it chiefly on behalf of the working people who are to inhabit these cottages, because, as your Lordships are perfectly aware, the more expensive the building is the higher must the rent tend to become, and the sufferers are not so much the landowners and the builders as the people who have to live in these cottages. I think that perhaps the principal grievance of all is that there is no court of appeal, no jurisdiction to which would-be builders can appeal to decide on any difficulty that arises between them and the local authorities. I wish to rest my case rather on general grievances, but I should like just to read a few lines from a letter received from the agent of a large landowner in the north of England. Writing from Wakefield, under date 16th March, he says—

> "Here we cannot build a coal-house even, or add on to a farm building, without having to get out plans of the fullest description for submission to the authorities. The erection of a wooden building to protect a wheelbarrow would be illegal. . . . . Lord St. Oswald was able to erect a shed at his colliery works without reference to anybody, they being exempt; but he could not erect a small building in connection with his farm without the necessity of preparing elaborate plans."

I should like to refer to the evidence of one witness. Mr. Munro, one of the principal officers of the Local Government Board, was a witness before us; and, in answer to a question whether under the existing law he considered hardships were entailed, he said—

> "Oh, yes, of course there will always be hardships under the existing law."

"Hard cases," I think was the exact expression he used. I venture to think that the words of that gentleman are alone sufficient justification for an attempt at legislation on this point.

If hard cases are brought before Parliament in which Chinamen or Russian Jews are concerned, Parliament makes it its business to inquire into them and to endeavour to redress those grievances; and I think I may claim that it is equally the duty of Parliament to examine and, if possible, redress hard cases in which British workmen's interests are concerned, for, as I said just now, this legislation is really not attempted on behalf of landowners or builders of cottages, but in the hope of being able to ensure British workmen a constant provision of good and suitable buildings. I think I am not going too far in saying that the evidence which was elicited before the Select Committee last year showed that in consequence of the tyranny and absurdity of some of the building by-laws landowners and cottage builders were in many districts holding their hands and refusing at present to go on building. There was a case from Lincolnshire in which we were told that a number of gentleman had determined to cease building any more cottages until some reform was made in the building by-laws.

I will endeavour to anticipate three arguments that may be, or might be, brought against legislation of this character. The first argument is that if you pass a measure of this kind you will let in the jerry builder: that very poor cottages of unsuitable character will be built. I do not think that this Bill will give the jerry builder any greater opportunities than he at present enjoys. Your Lordships will observe that the Bill only applies to detached and semi-detached cottages; and, as we all know, the jerry builder is in the habit of acquiring a small piece of land and building upon it a row or terrace of houses. In cases of that kind the Bill would not apply. Further, my Lords, the exemptions contained in Clause 2 we endeavour to safeguard by many regulations with regard to sanitary matters; so that I hope and trust, if the Bill becomes law, the jerry builder, at all events, will not be able to take advantage of it.

Then there is another argument that might be used against the Bill, and it is that the building by-laws of 1877, the old urban model, however unsuitable for country and rural districts, can be replaced by the model rural code of 1901. If the Local Government Board had the power of making rural district councils give up the old code and take the new code, there would be a great deal to be said in favour of that course; but your Lordships are probably aware that it is the fact that the Local Government Board, once they have sanctioned a code of building by-laws for any particular district, have no power whatever to force that district to take a new code in place of the old one. The late President of the Local Government Board and Mr. Burns, who is at present at the head of that Department, have very wisely and judiciously issued circulars to the rural district councils, pointing out to them how advisable it would be that the new code of 1901 should be adopted in place of the code of 1877, but in a great many cases no notice whatever has been taken of the Local Government Board's circulars; and there are reasons, I am afraid, why those circulars will remain nothing but waste paper.

It is far from my intention to make an attack on the administration of rural district councils, but we must not forget that in many cases, I think I may say in the majority of cases, there are people sitting as members of these councils to whom it is rather an advantage that the council should be working under a complicated and inadequate system of by-laws. You cannot forget that on most rural district councils in the country you find very often a builder or his son, or his brother; you find, perhaps, an architect, and you often find that the clerk to the council is a solicitor. Now, to all these people complicated and difficult by-laws under which to work brings grist to the mill, and those are not the people to whom it is at all agreeable that a simple, cheap, easy code of building by-laws should be in force. In cases where litigation takes place between the builder and the local authority, even if the case is won by the landowner or the builder, on whom does the cost of the legal proceedings fall? Why, on the successful landowner or builder, because in nine cases out of ten he is the principal ratepayer in the neighbourhood. With him it is a case, I am afraid, generally, of "heads I lose, tails you win," in any case of litigation with the rural district council. There is another argument that is rather more justifiable on the part of rural district councils as to why they will not adopt the new building code. The chairman of a rural district council pointed out to me some time ago that it had taken them years to get the original building code sanctioned by the Local Government Board. An enormous amount of correspondence had passed on the subject; and at last, after considerable delay, a code was sanctioned. He used words to this effect—

"We know that the new code of 1901 would be a much better one in this district, but we are not disposed to give up our old code and apply to the Local Government Board for a new one when we see reason to fear that we may be another three or four years before we get the new code sanctioned, and in the meantime the whole district will be in a state of confusion, and will not know under what building laws it is. We prefer, therefore, to keep our old code."

Another argument on behalf of rural district councils against adopting the new code was brought before the Select Committee last year. It is rather an amazing argument, but it was brought forward by the clerk to the East Grinstead District Council, whose view was that if they got a new code for building in their district, building would became cheaper and easier, and that that would be very hard on the people who had invested capital under the old code. Therefore he said they did not mean to apply for the new code. In dealing with this question you must remember that there are gentlemen like the clerk to the East Grinstead District Council and his colleagues who take this—I venture to think unfair—view of the problems that await us in considering how to provide better accommodation.

There is this further argument against legislation of this kind, that it would be preferable to give rural district councils the power of dispensing, in such cases as they may think fit, with the regulations of their own by-laws. Now, my

Lords, I venture to think that the majority of your Lordships will not consider the granting of such dispensing power a satisfactory solution of the problem, because it must open the door, at all events, to chances of jobbery, corruption, and favouritism. A council might find some reason for giving a dispensation to B. which they refused to A. But so unworkable are the present building by-laws found in several rural districts, that the councils have actually used this dispensing power, although it is illegal, and it has been declared that any ratepayer may proceed by a mandamus to make a rural district council enforce its own by-laws. I asked one witness who appeared before us last year—I think he was the chairman of the Chelmsford Rural District Council—whether, as a matter of fact, his council did claim this dispensing power, and his answer was—

> "We do not claim it, but we exercise it."

I think that a practice of that kind is an argument for legislation in this direction, because it shows that the present by-laws are found, at all events in that district, so unworkable that the council adopt a totally illegal course in order to obviate the difficulties. I was an interested witness of a debate that took place not very long ago in this House on my noble friend Lord Harrowby's initiation with regard to small holdings. I think your Lordships will agree with me that if an extension of the system of small holdings, of which my noble friend is so enlightened a promoter, is to take place to any great extent over this country, we shall want a considerable extension of houses in which to lodge the small holders and their families, and, therefore, I venture to claim that a Bill of this character, if it can do anything to promote the building of cottages, is almost entitled to logical precedence to a measure such as my noble friend advocates, and of which I also am a warm supporter. I do not pretend that this Bill is of a wide or extensive character, or that its result may be very wide or extensive, but I do think, as a witness before the Committee last year told us, that it will have in many districts a very considerable and beneficent result, and I therefore trust your Lordships will give it a Second Reading.

I will not trouble the House by going at any length through the clauses of the Bill. I have had the opportunity of conferring with the noble Earl the President of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries, and with the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board on this Bill, and I should like to express my grateful thanks to them for having met me and discussed the Bill with me. I believe that certain Amendments will be moved when we go into Committee, should the Bill be fortunate enough to secure a Second Reading, and I can only say that I shall be most willing to meet the views of the Government. I will defer any explanation of the clauses until the Committee stage.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^{a}."—(Lord Hylton).

LORD ZOUCHE OF HARYNGWORTH: My Lords, as a Member of the Select Committee which was appointed by your Lordships' House to inquire into this question, perhaps your Lordships will allow me to say one or two words in support of this Bill. After what my noble friend has said there is not very much to add except to assure your Lordships, which I think is almost unnecessary, that this is not a Bill of a polemical nature; it is not in the least of a Party character, but is an attempt to deal with a difficulty which is acknowledged on almost every side. The Committee to which my noble friend referred examined a good many witnesses from various parts of the country, who almost one and all supported some amendment of the present building by-laws, especially where they did involve a very vexatious restriction upon building schemes. In fact those witnesses who were in a certain measure against the Bill were not so much against its principle as against certain clauses of it, and were in favour of certain modifications. There was an undoubted consensus of opinion in favour of some change. Not only was this fully testified by the witnesses themselves, but it was brought out in evidence that many local authorities would wish to have the change, and were quite alive to the anomalous nature of some of their own regulations.

I do not propose to trouble your Lordships with much of the evidence, but I should like to refer to that given by Sir William Chance, who gave evidence of one or two very absurd instances of these restrictions. He referred to a scheme to utilise some old buildings in the making of new ones. There was nothing whatever against the scheme from a sanitary or from any other point of view. He said—

> "The scheme came before the committee of the district council. They knew that what they were going to do was an absolute absurdity, but they said that if the scheme was to be carried out the gentleman in question must pull down part of the building, as there was not sufficient open space at the rear."

The witness was asked—

> "Do you think your opinions are shared by your colleagues on the council?"

and his answer was—

> "I have given the two cases we had before us last Thursday. We have a by-laws committee, every member of which said the same thing, how absurd it was. But they added, 'We are bound to carry it out, otherwise we should have one law for one and one for another. We must have one law for all.'"

I think that is sufficient to show your Lordships that the grievance is not only felt from outside, but by many of the local authorities themselves.

As has been already remarked, this Bill, although at first sight rather technical, goes into deep and wide subjects. It is very intimately connected with the question of small holdings, about which we had an interesting debate some few days ago, because, of course, the success of small holdings very much depends on dwelling houses and buildings suitable for the small holders being erected without involving prohibitive costs.

One word about builders. It may possibly be that some of the builders object to an easier scheme of building because it would not give them quite such lucrative jobs, but I think the more sensible of them will see that the more restrictions are placed on building the less business there is, and, therefore, it is to their advantage to support any well-defined scheme. The matter is not without difficulty. It may be said to be at once simple and also difficult, but I think that the difficulties are more apparent than real. The matter has been thoroughly considered and thoroughly threshed out by this Committee. This is a Bill which attempts a practicable and reasonable solution of an admitted difficulty, and for this reason I hope your Lordships will consent to give it a Second Reading.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE AND FISHERIES (Earl CARRINGTON): My Lords, I am sure the House and the country are under an obligation to the noble Lord opposite for having brought this subject before your Lordships' House. He made a most excellent speech last year on the subject, and his Bill of last year passed a Second Reading and was then referred to a Select Committee. The noble Lord has given us the substance of the Report of that Committee. So far as the principle of the Bill itself is concerned, the Government are entirely in sympathy. They, like everybody else, are fully aware that the bye-laws as they at present exist want considerable revision and amendment.

But I am bound to say that the Bill, as it stands, does require a certain amount of alteration. I will venture to point out to the noble Lord a few of the alterations which we consider absolutely necessary, and if he can see his way to agree to these alterations, His Majesty's Government will be very glad to give the Bill a sympathetic and kindly support. In the first place, the title of the Bill would have to be altered, because, as it stands now, it embraces an Amendment of the Public Health Act, and we think it should be restricted, and I think the House will agree that it should be restricted, to building by-laws only. Under Clause 2 the Bill would apply to the whole of England and Wales. It would not, of course, touch London, but it would include Manchester, Leicester, and other large towns, which I venture to think is not the object of the noble Lord, and perhaps he would agree that the operation of this clause should be restricted to rural districts, or to urban districts to which it may be made to extend by order of the Local Government Board.

Then we should like to see another sub-section introduced into this clause running on parallel lines with Clause 4. If the noble Lord would agree to my proposal, Clause 4 might be struck out altogether. We propose to exclude from the exemption in Clause 2 by-laws relating to health, and to insert there a new sub-section, to be Sub-section 5, with the object of bringing in the by-laws under Section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875, with respect to the structure of walls, foundations, and roofs, for securing stability, for prevention of fire, and for purposes of health. I do not think the noble Lord will have any objection to that. Clause 3 can stand as it is. Clause 4, as I have said, we propose to omit altogether. Clause 5 can stand as it is.

We propose to omit altogether Clause 6, about which I believe there is a very strong diversity of opinion. As the noble Lord knows, this clause entirely alters, and I believe is intended to alter, the position of the Local Government Board as to its relations with local authorities as regards by-laws. The Local Government Board, as the House knows, can suggest an Amendment of by-laws, but they cannot force their own views on the local authorities. They can refuse to sanction by-laws submitted to them by the local authorities, but they cannot enforce a by-law of their own on an unwilling local authority; and, as the noble Lord informed the House, when a by-law is once made the Local Government Board have no power to alter it. Clause 6 of this Bill would give the Local Government Board an entirely new power, and most people think that that would be very strongly resented by local authorities; but if the principal of the exemptions in Clause 2, by the insertion of the sub-section to which I have alluded, and the appeal in Clause 7 are omitted, the main grievance as regards elasticity in the by-laws disappears.

Sometimes, as the noble Lord said, the borough or district council refuses to pass the plans, and go so far as to decline to give any reasons whatever. That happened to me this year. A district council, which had allowed me to put up four cottages in one part of the district three or four years ago, suddenly turned round and refused to allow me to put up two more in another part of the district, though they were to be identically the same cottages, built to exactly the same plans and specifications. I appealed to the chairman of the district council. He was a very sensible man, and the objections were waived. But no doubt councils do decline to approve of plans without giving any reason; and, as the noble Lord asks, What is a man to do under these circumstances? He may go on with his building, but he runs the risk of a prosecution. If he is prosecuted and loses his case he will have to pull down the house, and if he wins his case he has to pay the expenses of the action. It is not thought at all unreasonable to allow a court of petty sessions to determine whether a particular proposal does or does not conform to the by-laws.

In these circumstances, if the noble Lord will give me a general assurance that he has no great objection to these limitations, I can assure him there will be no opposition, as far as the Government is concerned, to the Second Reading, but my right hon. friend the President of the Local Government Board looks upon this Bill as an experimental measure, which indeed it is, and one the operation of which must be very carefully watched. It may encourage the building of houses—everybody hopes it will—but my right hon. friend is very anxious that nothing should be done which might, in any way, diminish the safeguards against insanitary conditions and the erection of bad houses.

Lord BURGHCLERE: My Lords, as my noble friend opposite knows, I have taken a very deep interest in this Bill, and I also had the honour of being a member of the Select Committee which your Lordships appointed last year to consider the Bill then brought forward by the noble Lord. I hope, therefore, your Lordships will allow me to make a few observations on the statement we have just heard from my noble friend the President of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries.

I entirely agree with the noble Earl that Clause 6 ought to come out. Clause 6, if I understand it aright, interferes with the position of local authorities in their own districts—a principle which I am sure my noble friend entirely disagrees with. It would also give the Local Government Board a very considerable amount of extra work in sending down inspectors, and would altogether increase the heavy duties which now fall upon that Department of the State. With regard to the alteration of Clause 2 which my noble friend has suggested, I would venture to point out to His Majesty's Government and to my noble friend that there are districts which are not purely urban, and not purely rural, but which, as it were, intermix. I shall be glad to hear during the Committee stage how the Government propose to meet that especial difficulty.

The only other criticism I would venture to make is with regard to Clause 7. If I understand my noble friend aright, the Government are in favour of retaining that clause as it stands. I personally have had some hesitation in adopting that course. Clause 7 gives to petty sessions—that is, to magistrates—power to interfere with what the local authority has determined, and if it is objectionable for the Local Government Board to interfere with what the district council has settled in its own district, it seems to me to be equally objectionable that the magistrates of the district should be allowed to interfere in local government matters. I venture to think that if this clause is retained it should be so altered that magistrates should be able to adjudicate only on the matters definitely set down in the Bill if they are not carried out by the local authorities. With regard to sanitation and other matters, they should not have power, as it appears to me they would have under Clause 7, to interfere with the determinations which the local authorities themselves had arrived at. I approve of the principle of the Bill, and I am sure that if properly carried out it will be of great benefit to rural districts, and may, in some way, though not entirely, by the creation of cheap, wholesome lodgings for the working classes, prevent that migration from the rural districts to the cities which I am sure all your Lordships deplore.

Lord Burghclere.

On Question, Bill read 2^a. accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

LIMITED PARTNERSHIPS BILL [H.L.].

House in Committee (according to order).

Bill passed through Committee and reported to the House without Amendment.

Moved, that the Standing Committee be negatived.—(Lord Avebury.)

The EARL of HALSBURY: I trust your Lordships will not agree to the Motion which the noble Lord has just moved. This Bill introduces a new system of law altogether, and I think it would be rather dangerous that it should be allowed to go through without being referred to the Standing Committee.

LORD AVEBURY: I moved the Motion negativing the Standing Committee as the Bill had twice been through Committee in this House without any Amendment being suggested, but in deference to the opposition of the noble and learned Lord, the late Lord Chancellor, I withdraw the Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn. Bill reported without Amendment; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

PUBLIC LIBRARIES ACTS (EXTENSION) BILL [H.L.].

[SECOND READING.]

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: My Lords, the matters that affect the consideration of this Measure are but few, and I will state them very briefly to your Lordships. The object generally of the Bill is to extend the operation of the Acts known as the Public Libraries Acts, and

I assume that your Lordships feel that public libraries, so far as they exist in this country, are of benefit to the community and deserve encouragement. As the Acts that control the existence of these libraries have received the support and assent of your Lordships, I assume also that the legislation, so far as it has gone, equally meets with your Lordships' consent.

As the matter stands now, the operation of these Acts is confined to limited areas. By the principal Act of 1892 and the Amending Act, public libraries can only be established in urban districts or in a parish. Reasons have lately been brought forward of a practical character to cause some to think that the benefit of these libraries should be extended to counties, and if these institutions are of advantage and utility in urban districts one cannot see why they should be other than beneficial in other districts. I am aware that there are practical difficulties, but I hope they may be overcome, in the way of applying these Acts to counties. At the same time I do not think your Lordships will contend that there is any reason why counties should be deprived of institutions which have been found of great benefit in urban districts.

The question is, If you apply these Acts to counties, how can you carry them into effect in relation to those counties? You must have a governing body. In an urban district you have, of course, the local council, and if you have a governing body at all in the case of counties, it must be, I presume, the county council. Since this Bill has been printed I have received a great many communications from noble Lords, but though I have been very much struck with the courtesy of the letters I cannot say that I have received much encouragement from them. The objection put to me by the noble Earl the President of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries was that it was not thought well to give the power of approval of the application of the Acts to a representative body. The noble Earl thinks the power ought to remain with the ratepayers as a whole to vote on this question. There is no doubt a great deal to be said in favour of that view, and I hope it will meet with your Lordships' approval that it should not be left to the county council alone, but that a plebiscite should be taken of the ratepayers as a whole. That is a provision that I am willing to see inserted in the Bill, and I hope it will remove the objection to the present clause on the part of the Local Government Board.

A general objection exists to any increase in the local rate, and I find that those who for particular reasons take an interest in this measure think the rate could be reduced by one-half, and that instead of being one penny, as it is in the principal Act, a half-penny rate would be sufficient in the larger areas. In a Welsh county recently a beneficent gentleman offered a certain sum for the provision of a public library, but, much to the regret of everyone, the offer could not be accepted and the county was denied the benefits of this grant because there is at present no power of creating a body to enable the sum to be received and applied for the purposes intended.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2ª.—(Lord James of Hereford.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN rose to move "That the Bill be read 2ª this day six months." The noble Earl said: My Lords, I am sure there is no Member of your Lordships' House who wishes to be in any way lacking in courtesy to my noble and learned friend who has just spoken, and I am very glad he recognises that all those to whom he has spoken with regard to this Bill have not been deficient in kind expressions towards himself, although they may not have been equally favourable to this Bill

The state of the law at the present time is as has been stated by my noble and learned friend. The Act of 1892 confers upon parishes and urban districts the power, by a vote of the ratepayers, of obtaining a public library, and, of course, any parish in a county which desires to have a public library may, by a vote of its ratepayers, obtain one. Therefore, in this sense, the benefits of the Libraries Acts can at present be obtained by any parish or any urban district within a county. This Bill proposes to go further, and to say that there may be a county library as distinct from parish or urban district libraries. I think it is unnecessary to point out to your Lordships that a county is a very unfit district for a library. What centre can my noble friend or anyone of your Lordships name which would be convenient for the ratepayers generally of the county?

Not only that, but who would use this library? I presume that in most cases the centre adopted would be the county town. To an enormous majority of the rural parishes a library in a county town would be absolutely useless, and it would certainly be so to the ratepayers generally. I can conceive that there may be members of a county council who may go to the county town half an hour too soon, and who may wish to have some convenient sort of club in which to read French novels and otherwise amuse themselves until the time of their business arrives. As your Lordships know, there are always a certain number of persons who live in the vicinity of county towns to whom a library of this kind might be a very convenient lounge. But, apart from them, I do not see how to the county ratepayers generally a library could be of any use. My noble friend said, and he was rather hesitating on that point I thought, that there had been some demand for this Bill. I would ask him, was that demand made by the County Councils Association, or was it made by any county council in particular, because if it was made by one county council in particular, which, for the purposes of its own members, wishes to have a library, let it bring in a Private Bill, but do not let it, simply because it wishes to have a public library for itself, obtain that library by a general Bill of this kind.

My noble and learned friend goes further. He admits himself that a county is not a suitable area, because he proposes to alter entirely the procedure laid down by the Act of 1892. That Act says that a vote of the ratepayers is to be taken, but my noble and learned friend proposes that the library shall be an accomplished fact by a vote of the county council itself. I think there might be in a county council five or six people who desired a library of this sort, and we know that if half a-dozen people in an assembly set their minds upon attaining some object, they will find occasions when members are not attending for carrying their object out, and the ratepayers of the county, without knowing much about it, would suddenly find themselves saddled with a library which it would be impossible for the majority of them to use, but which they would have the satisfaction of paying for.

Clause 8 of the Bill deals with exemption. It provides that—

"Where the Public Libraries Acts, 1892 to 1901, have been adopted by any urban authority or parish within the county council district, such urban district or parish shall be exempted from payment of the Public Libraries Acts Rate levied by the county council authority."

What will the result be? Every district in a county which wishes for a library will have got it, and it will be paying for it. The parishes which have not adopted the Act will alone remain as contributors to the cost of the library in the county town or in the centre of the county. I cannot help thinking that those who drafted this Bill are not very well acquainted with county administration. For instance, it says in Clause 2—

"For the purposes of this Act, and subject to the provisions thereof, every county council district in England and Wales shall be a library district."

I am not aware that there is such a thing in existence as a county council district. The administrative area of a county council is the county. When I first read that clause I thought this was a proposal to establish district libraries and not county libraries. That, at all events, is one instance which I think shows that those who have drawn up this Bill have not studied the question very deeply.

I do not think that I need detain your Lordships longer. I must say that it seems to me that a county is not at all a proper area for a library. As to the assessment, the county rate is an unfortunate fund into which everybody thinks he has a right to dip his hand, and of late years the additional burdens which have been laid on the county rates have been enormous, and they are constantly increasing. The much-burdened ratepayer has expressed his disgust in a variety of ways. I am not at all sure that he did not do it very largely in the ballot box not long ago, and I submit to your Lordships that we ought to be very careful indeed in this House in scrutinising Bills which propose to impose additional burdens on the county rates. For these reasons I beg to move the Amendment standing in my name.

Amendment moved—

"To omit the word 'now' in order to insert at the end of the Motion these words 'this day six months.'"—(The Earl of Camperdown.)

EARL CARRINGTON: My Lords, I am bound to confess that, on the Bill as it stands, I think most of your Lordships will be disposed to agree with my noble friend who has just sat down; but there are special circumstances in this case which have induced my noble and learned friend to bring in this measure, and I am empowered to make a suggestion to him. If he will agree that a rural council should have the same power to adopt the Acts as an urban council has now under the Act of 1893, the charge to be on the local rate, but that the county council should have the power to contribute to the library out of the county rate if it so chooses, I am empowered to say that His Majesty's Government will offer no objection to the Second Reading.

LORD BELPER: My Lords, I should like to say one word in response to the remarks which have just been made by my noble friend the President of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries. I understand his proposal is to bring before the House a totally new Bill. This Bill is to extend to county councils powers which are at present given to urban districts and parishes. The county is already completely covered by powers to every parish and urban council to have libraries in their own district. I can quite understand that it may be desirable, and I do not see any objection to extending that power to rural district councils. But I think that would be a complete redrafting of the Bill, and if it is only proposed to extend to rural district councils the same power that is given to urban councils, it would be much better to withdraw this Bill and bring in a Bill for that purpose. In fact, if that is all that is intended, all the machinery in this Bill would fall to the ground, and there would be very little left of the present drafting except the title.

The principle of the Bill, that is to say, that local authorities should have powers with regard to libraries, has been over and over again admitted. I am surprised at my noble friend bringing forward this Bill without giving the House any reasons, the area being already covered in the way I have described, why a county council should be made the authority for exercising the powers under the Libraries Act. It is an unsuitable area. It would be impossible to choose any place or places in a county which would be convenient for a building of which county ratepayers could make use. As a matter of fact, as has been stated, the county town would probably be the only suitable centre, and in many county towns there already exist very adequate libraries. Not only do they exist for the use of the town itself, or the parish in which it is situated, but there are powers under the existing Acts for the authorities allowing the people outside that area to use the library, either on payment or without payment. It seems to me that that would be a much more convenient way of meeting the case of the neighbouring parishes than by putting a rate on the ratepayers who are living very likely at a great distance, and who would probably never use the powers under the Act at all.

I join with Lord Camperdown in what he said about rateable powers being continually put on county councils. There is never a meeting of the County Councils Association where there is not some complaint of Acts passed by Parliament giving powers to county councils and putting the whole expense of administering those Acts on the county ratepayers. While we acknowledge that the rating of agricultural districts is not in a satisfactory condition, and while it has been recognised by the Local Taxation Committee that there ought to be material changes with regard to the taxation of the country, nothing has been done, but the ratepayers of the county are continually having fresh obligations thrown upon them, some of them of a very serious nature. Parliament passes these Acts and gives the administration of them to county councils, but makes no contribution out of the Consolidated Fund towards their cost. After what my noble friend the President of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries has said, I hope my noble and learned friend will consider that it would hardly be his Bill if amended in the way suggested, and personally I would hesitate to vote for the Second Reading of this Bill unless it was proved that there is a greater demand for it than has been shown to the House to-day.

*THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Lord FITZMAURICE): My Lords, in addressing your Lordships for the first time I desire to ask for that indulgence which is always asked for, and rightly asked for, by those who rise under such circumstances. The Bill before your Lordships' House is one which, I think, in substance, in regard to its object, probably all of us would sympathise with, but the question which His Majesty's Government have to consider is as to how far the machinery proposed by the Bill is adequate to carry out the objects which the Bill proposes, and how far in these days, when questions of rating exercise such great influence and excite such great interest, the burdens which would arise under this Bill would be distributed in a manner likely to be generally approved.

I think there is hardly one of us—especially those, and they are very numerous in your Lordships' House, who are concerned with county administration—who is not aware that from time to time public libraries that had been set up by private effort, after living a more or less flourishing existence for a while, fall on troubled days and gradually disappear. There is no power in our rural districts, such as exists in our towns, of giving institutions of that kind that guarantee of permanence which is the consequence of their having the support behind them of a public body. It was believed, no doubt, by those who framed the original Public Libraries Act that the powers given would be largely adopted, but that was not so. They were adopted in boroughs and in urban districts, and gradually Parliament substituted in our boroughs and urban districts the action of the public local authority for the action of the ratepayers themselves, voting either by ballot or voting paper.

Now, the idea which underlies this Bill is that we should extend in some way or another to the county districts of England the same power which has been applied under the Acts of 1892 and 1893 to the boroughs and urban councils. But it does not follow, for the reasons just stated by my noble friend, if we approve of the object that necessarily we approve of the machinery of the Bill. I think everybody who has had to do with county administration knows that one of the difficulties is the cry that is very often raised against what is called centralisation in the county town, and what I am afraid of is that under the machinery of the Bill as it stands it will be exceedingly difficult for a county council to put the very machinery into operation which the Bill proposes to entrust to it, because it would be said that the county council was legislating for an area consisting of part of the county in regard to which it could not have such adequate information or such knowledge as would be possessed by the actual representatives of the locality. Under these circumstances my noble friend who represents this Department in your Lordships' House has made a suggestion which I cannot help hoping will go very far to meet both the views of my noble friend who has introduced this Bill and also the objections which have been urged.

Under the Act of 1892, as the House is aware, the vote of the ratepayers in a district, whether a borough or an urban district or a parish, was the final and determining factor, but it is very curious that immediately following the passage of that Act a most important Amendment was made by another Act; the vote of the urban council sitting as a representative assembly was substituted for the vote of the ratepayers, and that vote is practically final and determines the matter. What my noble friend has suggested is this, that the same power which Parliament gave a number of years ago to urban councils, and which I say, speaking from my own knowledge, has been exercised more and more as time goes on with excellent results, should be given to rural councils. If that were done it would meet one of the injustices of the present situation which was alluded to by my noble friend who preceded me in this debate—I mean that you have a library now set up in an urban district which is charged on the borough or urban rate, and the ratepayers of the surrounding districts get the benefit of that library without paying for it. If this arrangement were adopted, the borough and urban council would be able to say, "If we are to be asked to set up a library in our district, we must know what the rural council immediately surrounding us is going to do." In that manner I am inclined to think the suggestion made by my noble friend would be an exceedingly valuable one, because it would enable and encourage districts to combine together, and we should have this great and inestimable advantage, that we should be legislating on uniform lines.

As being connected myself with a rural district more than with any town, I ask why is the rural district council not to be treated with as much respect as the council of a small town. I think rural councils ought to be encouraged to come into line. I am quite willing to grant, however, that although I hold that view I think there is a sphere for the county council in this matter. Here again I would submit that the suggestions made by my noble friend the President of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries are perfectly in keeping with the general lines of our recent legislation on these matters. We cannot be too careful in trying to legislate upon recognisable lines, and not to increase that confusion from which local government in times past has so greatly suffered, and from which we are only slowly emerging.

Your Lordships are acquainted with the machinery and working of county councils, and are quite aware that gradually Parliament has enabled county councils to exercise a certain amount of control, and in certain cases also to contribute out of the county rate in aid of the expenses of the local authority. I believe there is no clause in the Local Government Act of 1888, which was passed by the Party opposite, which has been more useful or which has done more to improve our roads than the section which gives power to county councils to contribute to the improvements made by local authorities, not on main roads, but on their own local roads. In that way a county council has very often been able to say, "If you will do certain things which will cost so much, we will give you a proportion." In my own county we always contribute one-sixth to the cost of any approved improvement. I am inclined to think that it would be a great advantage if county councils were able to say to the smaller local authorities in their counties, "If you will act in a certain way in regard to these institutions we will come forward and help you in a moderate and reasonable manner." In this way, while throwing the main responsibility and chief cost on the locality benefiting, the county council might play a very useful part in encouraging a movement which I am bound to say I think is a very useful one.

I know myself how very frequently schoolmasters complain of the difficulty in keeping up their own education and in keeping their minds fresh, if I may use the expression, because when they go to out-of-the-way places it is impossible to get at any books, and I cannot help thinking that, especially in a year when in all probability the education question is going to occupy a large portion of the attention of Parliament, it is well that we should bear in mind that education often is greatly handicapped in our rural districts because of the difficulty referred to. The position of His Majesty's Government is this, that we sympathise with the object of my noble and learned friend, but we do not think the machinery of his Bill is very satisfactory. We cannot help hoping that he will consent to the whole question going to a Committee and these different alternatives being considered. I know from communications which have reached me and from my own experience that there is a real and genuine desire that something of this kind should be done.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: My Lords, I very gladly accept the proposal of my noble friend the President of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries. In fact, I do not feel myself in a position to refuse any reasonable offer of assistance. The suggestion of my noble friend merely carries out, as far as I can judge, the view I have before me. I would suggest that this debate should now be adjourned, and I will put upon the Paper a clause that I think can be carried. I will place it on the Paper before the debate on the Second Reading is resumed, and if it is agreed to it can be grafted on the Bill. Perhaps it would not be in order for me to move the adjournment of the debate, but I should be very glad if some noble Lord would do so for me.

LORD BURGHCLERE: I beg to move that the debate be adjourned.

Moved, "That the debate stand adjourned."—(Lord Burghclere.)

LORD BELPER: My Lords, with regard to procedure, I may perhaps be allowed to say one or two words. If the noble and learned Lord in charge of the Bill proposes to adjourn this debate in order that he may put new clauses into the Bill——

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: Only one clause.

LORD BELPER: One clause would not enable the suggestions made by the noble Earl the President of the Board of Agriculture and Fisheries to be carried out. Then there were the further suggestions made by the noble Lord the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. At any rate, if it is attempted to deal with the matter in one clause, I hope sufficient time will be given for the consideration of that clause. My own view is that there ought to be a new Bill. The suggestions made on behalf of the Government can hardly be grafted on this Bill. Whatever is done, I hope that ample time will be given for the consideration of any fresh proposal by the County Councils Association

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON AND THE EARL OF HALSBURY both rose, the latter giving way for the Lord Privy Seal.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (The Marquess of RIPON): My Lords, I am afraid my noble and learned friend cannot do exactly what he proposes. He cannot give notice of an Amendment until the Bill has been read a second time. According to the rules and practice of the House, notice of all Amendments must be given, and can only be given after the Bill has been read a second time.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: The noble Marquess has stated what I rose to say, and, therefore, there is no need for me to do more than endorse what he has said.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I cannot help thinking that the noble and learned Lord would be better advised if he withdrew this Bill and introduced a fresh one. There are plenty of opportunities in this House of getting a day for dealing with a Bill, and I certainly think that course would be the best one.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: I gather that it is the feeling of the House that I should adopt the course suggested of withdrawing this Bill and introducing a new one. I therefore beg to withdraw the Bill, and I hope that every consideration will be extended to the new one which I shall introduce.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ADMINISTRATION OF THE ALIENS ACT.

LORD NEWTON rose to call attention to the administration of the Aliens Act. The noble Lord said: My Lords, in calling attention to the administration of this Act I should like to remind the House that it was founded upon the Report of a Royal Commission presided over by my noble and learned friend Lord James of Hereford; that it was the principal measure of last session; that it was strongly, not to say bitterly, opposed in the other House; that it was carried by the closure; and that when it came up here, owing to circumstances which I need scarcely recall to the memory of the House, it was practically not debated at all; and, finally, I should like to point out that its administration depends very largely upon the views of the Home Secretary. I am not going to waste your Lordships' time in discussing the intentions of the Act, but I should like to insist upon the fact that very great pains were taken not to exclude any angels unawares, and every sort of precaution was adopted that refugees of the genuine type should not be excluded. I believe it is perfectly accurate to maintain that there has hardly been a case in which a genuine refugee has not been admitted. At any rate, there have been doubtful cases, and in each case the benefit of the doubt has been given on the side of the alien.

A very active campaign was conducted against this measure during its progress and after it became an Act, and a large number of allegations have been made against it, allegations which, as a matter of fact, have never been substantiated, and it is extremely difficult to reconcile the unfavourable opinions which have been expressed with regard to this Act, because there appears to be two views. One is the view that it is a grossly tyrannical measure which has excluded large numbers of deserving people from this country, and the other view is that it is such an extremely small and contemptible Act that it is hardly worth noticing at all. As a supporter of the former view, a Member of the other House who really ought to know better has distinguished himself by asserting a certain number of Russian deserters who were refused admission to this country, were returned to Russia, and were there executed.

I might point out that this is an extremely improbable assertion of itself, for, as everyone who knows Russia will admit, it is an extremely difficult task for anyone to get on board a Russian steamer without having proper papers, and therefore what happens is this: A Russian deserter almost invariably makes his way into Germany and embarks on a German steamer. It is from a German port that he arrives here, and it is obvious that if a deserter arrived in that way and was rejected he would return to Germany, and there would be no means of putting him to death, because there is no military convention between Russia and Germany. As, moreover, no sort of proof has ever been given with regard to this allegation, as it has further been denied by the Russian Government, and as the Foreign Office also professes entire ignorance on the subject, I really am inclined to think that I am perhaps paying too much honour to this Member of Parliament in alluding to his assertion at all.

Then, on the other hand as representing the other line of argument, we have the Daily News which has consistently poured contempt on the Act by showing how very few people have been affected by it in the sense of rejected aliens. I pass now to another organ—a paper called the Manchester Guardian—which has always been noted no less for its unrelenting hostility to the late Government than for its overpowering affection for aliens of all kinds, from Mad Mullahs downwards. This organ, recognising at once in the Aliens Act the lowest depths of political depravity, instituted an inquiry of its own into the working of the Act. I believe that this enterprising organ conducted a most painstaking inquiry, and at the end it was obliged to confess that the Act has been administered in a broadminded and even in a liberal spirit; and the Home Secretary himself has been compelled to admit that in some particulars at all events he has found it an extremely useful measure. If any further proof of the leniency of this Act were required it would be found in the fact that during the month of January only eighty-nine persons were refused admittance to this country, and owing to what I may call the extremely lenient and liberal character of the Act it will be readily admitted that these eighty-nine people must have been so undesirable in their nature that no civilised country would have tolerated their presence for a moment.

It is this liberal, lenient, and popular Act—for there is no doubt whatever as to its popularity in the country—whose chief defect appears to be that it does not go far enough, that the Home Secretary has set himself to emasculate, and this is easily performed by changing the object of one of the provisions of the Act and by altering one of the rules. I observe that the Home-Secretary, when challenged with having nullified the Act, pleaded in his defence that he had only altered one rule; just as a person who had a charge brought against him might excuse himself by saying he had "broken only one of the ten commandments." The alteration occurs with regard to Section 8, Subsection 2, which defines an immigrant ship as one which brings more than twenty alien passengers, "or such number as may be fixed by order of the Secretary of State."

When this Bill came up here last session I moved an Amendment to reduce the number from twenty to ten on the ground that possibly by the time the Act came into operation a Liberal Government might be in Office, and that it was, therefore, rather dangerous to entrust an unsympathetic Secretary of State with so much latitude. I therefore urged—and, of course, urged unsuccessfully—that it would be safer to reduce the number from twenty to ten. My noble friend Lord Belper, who was in charge of the Bill in this House, and who, naturally, would have nothing to do with my Amendment, because, however excellent it might have been, there was no time to carry it, replied to me as follows, showing that extreme and almost child-like confidence in his successor which one occasionally encounters amongst experienced Ministers, viz.—

> "The Government were aware that if the number was rigidly fixed at twenty the provision in the Bill might be avoided by shipowners bringing in less than twenty aliens. That was the reason why special power was given to the Secretary of State to vary the number if found desirable. He did not entertain intense distrust of the Secretary of State in this matter."

If I were of a conceited disposition I should be inclined to boast that on this occasion I had proved myself an absolutely correct prophet, or at any rate, far more so than my noble friend.

What happened? A Departmental Committee was formed for the purpose of making the rules in question; and, after a long and careful inquiry, the number was reduced from twenty to twelve, and I am informed that even this number of twelve was found to be too high, and that many opportunities were thereby afforded of evading the Act. I observed that only a fortnight ago the members of the London Immigration Board met at the Guildhall and unanimously agreed to recommend that the number should be reduced from twelve to five. The reply of the Home Secretary to that is to increase the number to twenty. In view of this fact I think it is quite clear that we are entitled to have the Report which I have alluded to—it cannot possibly be confidential, for there cannot be anything secret about it—and to know the reasons which have influenced the Secretary of State in making this important change.

So much with regard to the alteration of the rules. The other question to which I shall briefly refer is the action of the Home Secretary with reference to the circumstances under which the aliens are allowed to land. Clause 1 is the clause which deals with the power to prevent the landing of undesirable immigrants. Sub-section 3 reads as follows—

> "But in the case of an immigrant who proves that he is seeking admission to this country solely to avoid persecution or punishment on religious or political grounds leave to land shall not be refused on the ground merely of want of means or the probability of his becoming a charge on the rates."

I should like to explain that the machinery by which this Act is carried out consists of immigration officers and immigration boards. The immigration officers are under the control of the Home Office; the immigration boards are not. The immigration officer is really the important person, because he is the person who gives the order for admittance or rejection, and, if he refuses, then the board comes into play.

The action of the Home Secretary has been as follows: He sent a letter of advice to the boards, over whom he has no control at all, as to how he considers the Act ought to be interpreted. To the immigration officers, who are under his control, he sent a letter of instructions, or, I think it is more correct to say, a letter containing orders, and they are to this effect: that in all cases in which immigrants coming from parts of the Continent which are in a disturbed condition claim that they are flying from persecution, they should have the benefit of the doubt when any doubt exists, and leave to land must be given. Now, supposing my noble friend behind me, the Duke of Bedford, as President of the Zoological Society, were to issue a letter of advice to the council suggesting that impecunious persons might, under certain conditions, be admitted into the gardens, and at the same time wrote to the men at the turn-stiles saying that everyone was to be allowed in who asserted that he had not got the necessary funds. That is what it comes to. Taking this view of the matter, the function of the Immigration Board becomes an absolute farce. The board does not come into play at all. The alien is to be admitted, according to the instructions given to the immigration officer, and therefore the board might, so far as I can see, almost as well not exist.

The principle of the clause, as it was intended to act, was that the alien had to prove that he was a refugee. Now, the onus of proof is thrown on the immigration officer, who before he can refuse admission has to prove that the would-be immigrant is not a refugee, and he naturally is perfectly incapable of proving anything of the kind. It is perfectly obvious that doubt must always exist. Considerable doubt must exist as to what countries may fairly be described as being in a disturbed condition. Turkey, for intance, might be described as in a permanently disturbed condition. The Balkan States can be described as being periodically in a disturbed condition. Austria-Hungary is in a temporarily disturbed condition. In France there is a disturbed condition arising through conflict between the State and the Church; and Russia may be said to be indefinitely disturbed. To realise the absurdity of the way in which the Act must work try to imagine, if you can, an impecunious Briton being permitted to land in the United States on the ground that he was a victim of religious or political persecution, and it then transpiring that he was a passive resister or a conscientious objector. On one of these guileless refugees was found a letter telling him to say he had been lying hid in a cellar, that he had seen a number of men butchered, but that he was to conceal the fact that the £5 on him was borrowed.

By the altering of this provision the Act has been rendered little better than a farce. I learn from a newspaper that over 1,000 aliens have landed in London during the last ten days, and that in not one single case was any objection made and not a single appeal taken to the Immigration Board. We stand, in short, almost exactly as we did before the Act was passed, and the only thing that remains of any value apparently is the deportation of aliens after they have been brought to justice. I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything more on the subject. All this talk about the sacred rights of asylum being violated is little better than mere rubbish. It is perfectly clear that there is no grievance of that kind at all. What the object of His Majesty's Government can be in encouraging large numbers of aliens to come to this country, when, according to their own statement, between 12,000,000 and 13,000,000 of English people are on the verge of starvation under the blessings of free trade, is beyond my comprehension. Neither can I see how effective action can be taken on my part against the majority of 300 in another place. But if this Act is nullified, let us be perfectly clear as to how it has happened, and who is responsible for it.

EARL BEAUCHAMP: My Lords, the noble Lord who has just sat down has taken the most unusual course in this House of confining his remarks entirely to the Motion of which he had given notice, and I shall hope to follow that admirable example. I should like to express my sympathy with one criticism he made of the Act itself, as to the defects from which it undoubtedly suffers, owing to the fact that it received no amendment while in your Lordships' House. I am sure that he will agree with me that, under these circumstances, the Act has not reached that standard of perfection which we expect from an Act upon which your Lordships have exercised your power of revision. The noble Lord seemed to have been misled by the extravagances of the halfpenny Press, of which, I confess, I am not so great a student as he is. But with regard to the 1,000 aliens who, he says, have been landed in London during the last ten days, I should like to point out that he makes no reference to those who were transmigrants and were going on to other countries. The figures of the noble Lord are unofficial, and cannot be accepted as correct. As to the actual administration of the Act itself, I may point out that the Act came into operation on the 1st January, and it was necessary that certain rules and regulations should be made before that date. The regulations were drawn up in the Home Office, but the late Secretary of State left the Office without signing them and they were signed as they stood by my right hon. friend the present Secretary of State, who does not, I think, accept any responsibility with regard to them as they stood at that time. It is interesting to point out to your Lordships the full figures with regard to the refusals which took place under the rules and regulations sanctioned, though not technically signed, by Mr. Akers-Douglas. In addition to the eighty-nine refusals in the month of January there were only fifty refusals in the month of February, so that the total number of refusals under the Aliens Act, which we were told was going to exclude such large numbers of people from competition in the home market, only amounted to 139. If that was continued throughout the year it would not have amounted to anything like a large number. The figures with regard to March are not available, but, in consequence of certain religious festivals which occur at the early part of the month, it is probable that there will not be a large number of refusals owing to the number of Jews travelling being much smaller than in January and February.

With regard to the new regulations, they in no way interfere with what is considered by many people to be the most important part of the Act, the exclusion of those whom noble Lords on both sides of the House wish to see excluded, the criminal or diseased alien. Nothing in these regulations will interfere with their exclusion. There were three new regulations issued by the Secretary of State in addition to those which, as I have said, were drafted by Mr. Akers-Douglas. The first one had reference to the admission of the Press, and I think that on this matter, while there is any difficulty in getting at the facts, it is exceedingly valuable that we should, with the help of the Press, be able to know exactly what takes place.

Then, with regard to the second regulation, I might perhaps read to your Lordships part of the letter from the Secretary of State to the Immigration Board—

> "The Act was passed for the purpose of checking the immigration of undesirable aliens. Parliament, in the judgment of the Secretary of State, never intended that in the administration for that object of the provisions of the Act they should be applied with a rigidity which excludes consideration as to whether refusal of leave to land would involve great personal hardship or suffering in the case of women or children. Again, the statements of a man claiming to be a political or religious refugee may be insufficient or inaccurate, yet he may be exposed to serious risk from political causes if he is forced to return. Though the Secretary of State recognises that the absence of corroborative evidence frequently makes it difficult for the board to come to a decision, he hopes that, having regard to the present disturbed condition of certain parts of the Continent, the benefit of the doubt, where any doubt exists, may be given in favour of any immigrants who allege that they are flying from religious or political persecution in such districts."

I ask noble Lords opposite if they wish that the benefit of the doubt should not be given to those aliens who come here and say they are flying from religious or political persecution, and I should be glad to take the parallel case with regard to the Zoological Gardens. If the noble Duke who is President of the Zoological Society found that a number of children who had never had a chance of seeing the gardens, who had never had the chance of enjoying a day's liberty, who came from the slums, and who the noble Duke knew on their return to their homes without having been admitted to the Zoological Gardens ran the risk of being severely beaten or badly treated—in those circumstances there is no member of your Lordships' House who would not appove of the action of the noble Duke in allowing them to enter the gardens. The noble Lord also referred to the statements which were made by Mr. Rothschild. Mr. Rothschild is no supporter of His Majesty's Government, and I think the noble Lord had better settle that matter with Mr. Rothschild himself.

The third regulation to which I have to draw attention raised the number of aliens from twelve to twenty. Twenty is the number in the Act itself. I do not know that it is necessary for any member of His Majesty's Government to defend the selection of that number by the late Secretary of State. Twenty was the number in the Act, and I think I may safely leave the defence of that number to the noble Lord my predecessor who is, I am glad to see, in the House this afternoon. But I should like to say that one reason which I believe actuated the Secretary of State in raising the number from twelve to twenty, was to relieve the pressure on the immigrant ports. The vast majority of the ports in this country have not got immigration boards, and ships which came to non-immigrant ports having fewer than twelve immigrants of course passed in freely. If they had more they were subject to this Act, and had to go round to one of the ports at which the machinery established under this Act was in existence. After only two months experience of this Act the Home Office found that more than one case of hardship had arisen, and there were real reasons why the number should be altered.

I will give your Lordships two instances of the way in which this Act did press hardly on foreigners coming into this country. There was the case of the French onion sellers who arrived at a non-immigrant port. As there were more than twelve of them on board the ship there was a great deal of difficulty as to their admission to this country to carry on a trade to which none of us have any objection at all. There was another case in which a number of Scandinavian sailors came to this country in order that they might join certain ships which were lying in non-immigrant ports. Under the order it would have been impossible for them to join their ships unless they had gone round to one of the Tyneside ports and travelled from there by train to the port where the ships were lying which they were to join. Under these circumstances, I do not think that it is very easy to blame the Secretary of State for doing what after all is only a matter of detail and not one of principle, and fixing the number at twenty, which His Majesty's late Government themselves thought should be the number necessary to make a ship an immigrant ship. In conclusion, I only desire to quote to your Lordships a statement that was made in the House of Commons the other day by the Solicitor-General in the late Government. Sir E. Carson said—

> "So far as he could see there was no justice in the allegation that the rules and recommendations of the right hon. Gentleman had in any way interfered with the Act of Parliament. Therefore, the only matter in which there might be ground for criticism seemed to be taken away if they looked at the thing fairly and honestly, because all that the Home Secretary had done was to bring to the minds of the immigration officers a sense of their duty. As the right hon. Gentleman was going to give the Act fair play it was only right that he should have a fair chance."

I am quite unable to add anything to those admirable sentiments of Sir Edward Carson.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: My Lords, I confess I do not think this matter ought to be treated in the somewhat light manner in which it has been treated. If the Secretary of State has issued the directions that I understand he has issued, I think it is a most serious and important question, and one of far greater importance than the particular matter with which we are dealing, because if it was once supposed that an Act of Parliament deliberately passed by the Legislature could be set aside by indirect means at the direction of the Secretary of State, the mischief of such a proposition would extend far beyond the particular controversy we are now engaged upon. I understand that what the Secretary of State said was this—

> "I have issued to all the immigration officers instructions that in all cases in which immigrants coming from ports of the Continent which are at present in a disturbed condition, allege that they are flying from religious or political persecution, the benefit of the doubt, where any doubt exists as to the truth of the allegation, must be allowed and leave to land must be given."

I venture to say that the action of the Home Secretary is contrary to the Act of Parliament. The Statute itself contains an express direction. I do not think there is any doubt what the language can mean. Happily it is not a question of doubtful law; it is the ordinary application of the English language, and I venture to think that the words in the Act are not susceptible of doubt.

After the general proposition that an undesirable alien shall not be permitted to land, the statute proceeds thus—

> "But in the case of an immigrant who proves that he is seeking admission to this country solely to avoid persecution or punishment on religious or political grounds . . . . leave to land shall not be refused."

The Act of Parliament contains an express direction that the intending immigrant shall "prove" that he is seeking admission solely to avoid persecution or punishment on political or religious grounds. The good sense of that is obvious enough. What can the immigration officer know about the facts, and whether or not a man is flying from persecution? Of course, if the man offers no proof it can always be said that the matter is in doubt, and, according to the Secretary of State's instructions to his subordinates, leave to land must be given.

I do not know what the facts were that were put before my very distinguished and learned friend Sir Edward Carson, but it is astonishing to me that a lawyer of his eminence should say that the express direction of the statute was satisfied by a mere allegation that the man was flying from persecution; and I can only suppose that a particular and partial view had been placed before my learned friend when he made his statement in another place. The whole subject is one of a far more serious character than appears to be imagined. The question here is whether the Secretary of State has taken upon himself to disobey the law; whether a state of law has been created by the Secretary of State's directing persons under his command to disobey the Act of Parliament. I have not the least desire to treat harshly any awkward phrase, and I sympathise with the position of a Gentleman like the present Secretary of State for the Home Department who is not himself a lawyer, and must more or less rely upon the advice given to him; but I want to know if the words I have quoted accurately state the directions he has given to his subordinates. If so, I should like to know from any lawyer whether he can reconcile these two things; and, if he cannot, it appears to me that respect for the law has not been observed.

The action of the Home Secretary in directing the immigration officers under his control deliberately to disobey the Act of Parliament in this way seems to me a much more serious and grievous infraction of the law than the slight inadvertence in connection with the whipping of the Chinese in South Africa of which we have heard so much during the last twenty-four hours. I speak always with reserve on such a subject. I have not got the words of the directions to the immigration officers. I only gather what they were from a report, which may not be accurate, of a statement in the other House of Parliament; but, if the words are as reported, I say, as a lawyer, that there cannot be the slightest doubt that the directions so given are contrary to the Act of Parliament and constitute an outrage upon the ordinary observance of the law.

*LORD FITZMAURICE: My Lords, if I desired to give a merely debating reply to the noble and learned Earl who has just addressed your Lordships I might be content with pointing out to him that it is highly improbable that the Solicitor-General of the very Government of which he himself was so great an ornament should have committed himself in his place in Parliament to the approval of the action of the Home Secretary of the present Government without adequate and full consideration. But, my Lords, I feel that it would be hardly respectful on my part to the noble and learned Earl if I were to confine myself to what I have called a merely debating answer. Therefore I propose to say a few words upon the general question which has been brought forward by my noble friend opposite, and I shall allude more particularly to what has fallen from the noble and learned Earl.

The Home Secretary has, in the first place, been accused of gross inconsistency. He has been told that whereas upon one of the earliest days on which Parliament met he spoke favourably of the operation of this Act, a very short time after, under the pressure, it was alleged, of excited and fiery speeches made outside and articles written in newspapers, he altered his position and climbed down from what he had said before. In that matter I desire to say—and it is my duty, I think, to allude to this part of the question—that nothing could possibly be more unfair than that charge against the Home Secretary, because the portion of the Bill of which he spoke favourably was not the portion which has been discussed in your Lordships' House to-night. and which was discussed subsequently in the House of Commons, but another clause of the Bill, namely, Section 3, which is generally known as the "expulsion of undesirable aliens clause," which everyone will agree is a most desirable and excellent clause.

I feel how almost absurd it is for me, following the noble and learned Earl, to allude to a legal issue, but if so humble a person as a chairman of quarter sessions may be allowed to refer to a legal matter, I may say that I have before now had before me as prisoners foreigners who had committed a long series of skilful crimes, and I unhesitatingly say that I have long wished that legislation of this kind had been passed so that a Judge or chairman of quarter sessions might be able to add to an ordinary sentence a sentence of expulsion or deportation. It was that portion of the Act to which the Home Secretary was alluding, and I hope that, whatever difference of opinion there may be with regard to the operation of the rest of this Act, on the value of that clause we are all agreed.

But in reality it is not that clause which has excited the feeling that has caused this debate. It is the principal clause of the Act—Clause 1—and more particularly that clause which relates to what is popularly called the right of asylum. It is not, perhaps, for me, not having been then a Member of your Lordships' House, to express an opinion, but I do think it was a matter of regret that last year the Amendments which I understand were actually placed upon the Table by the Members of the then Government were not proceeded with, because it would have given an opportunity to this House, in Committee, to consider the various points that had been raised. Nobody, I think, whatever his opinion may be on the general question, and the noble Lord who brought forward this matter did not go beyond general views, can deny that the wording of this Act is in many respects most unfortunate. If ever there was a case where the power of your Lordships' House as a chamber of revision over the work of the House of Commons might have been wisely and judiciously exercised, this was one which particularly called for such action on your part. However, it is too late to lament over that; but, nevertheless, we must bear this in mind, that the Home Office have been called upon to administer an exceedingly difficult Act of Parliament dealing with a most delicate subject and one full of legal pitfalls.

I am sure no Member of your Lordships' House, whatever his opinion may be, will deny that the right of political asylum is a matter to be spoken of with the greatest respect, to be dealt with with the greatest care, and not to be treated in any manner cavalierly. One criticism of my noble friend's speech would be, I think, that he treated this question a little too cavalierly and lightly, that he did not quite sufficiently realise the depth of feeling and thorough honesty which I claim for those who fought hard to defend what we believed, and what we believe now, to be one of the most cherished institutions of this country—the right of asylum. I do not hesitate to say that in your Lordships' House, because this right has been largely the creation of your Lordships' House. If you were to go back to such chapters of our history as the asylum which was given to Protestant refugees, to the Huguenots and others who came at different times to this country, the part played by your Lordships' House would bear comparison to that of any other body in the country, and therefore I claim that this House is just as much the guardian of this valuable and historic right of asylum which we have inherited as the House of Commons itself. The noble and learned Earl has asked that the Government should inform him as to what really has been the action of the Home Secretary in this matter.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: The actual language of the directions to the immigration officers.

*LORD FITZMAURICE: The distinction is perfectly clear, if I may say so, between the position of the Home Secretary with reference to the immigration officers in the ports, who are practically his own officers, and the immigration boards. With regard to the first, I am advised that the power of the Home Secretary is undoubted to give such directions as he has given, and those directions to the immigration officers are—

> "In all cases in which immigrants coming from parts of the Continent which are at present in a disturbed condition allege that they are flying from political or religious persecution, the benefit of the doubt, where any doubt exists, as to the truth of the allegation, will be allowed and leave to land will be given."

Those are the directions to the immigration officers. With regard to the immigration boards, the language of the Home Secretary is that of advice only. I am quite willing to communicate the full text if necessary, though in regard to that I understand from the noble and learned Earl that he would take no objection. But in this connection I am convinced, and I feel here that I may appeal to the noble Earl as one of the greatest legal authorities in this country, that if he will look at the use of the word "prove" in the proviso to Section 1 he will acknowledge that the peculiar use of that word in that direction opens up a great vista of legal difficulties. In terms the Act requires the alien immigrant to prove that he is a refugee. Obviously this would mean strict legal proof. Under the circumstances this would be impossible. Neither the immigration officer nor the immigration board is a court. They have no power to administer an oath, so obviously the proof required cannot be legal proof in the strict sense of the term.

I urged on the Government last year in another place that these courts should be open courts, and conducted as Courts of Law. As a matter of fact, I foresaw the difficulties which would arise, and I placed an Amendment on the Paper in which I took the actual words of the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879, which was passed by the noble and learned Earl and his colleagues, and under which all Petty Sessional courts are open courts and held in public places. I desired to assimilate the functions and jurisdiction of these courts of immigration. If that Amendment had been adopted I venture to think that none of these difficulties would have arisen. Immigrant ships arrive at all hours, and the examinations often taken place before the immigration officers in the dark, and on board ship, and in estimating what is meant by proof the conditions under which the examination is conducted must be taken into account.

The only possible evidence available is the statement of the alien, taken in conjunction with the probabilities of the case. If an alien states that he is a political refugee, and if it appears from the paper which he fills up and signs that he comes from a disturbed part of the Continent, the presumption is that his statement is correct, and the onus of proof is shifted, as the onus of proof is so often shifted in legal matters. The state of certain parts of Russia is a matter of common knowledge. The direction of the Home Secretary that an alien alleging himself to be a refugee is to have the benefit of the doubt is, I may also point out, confined to aliens who apparently come from disturbed parts of Europe, and therefore it would have no application to an alien alleging himself to be a Russian, but arriving in England from a place where there is no disturbance. The statement has been made that in this matter the Home Secretary has not acted in a statesmanlike or judicial manner, but according to the dictates of his inner conscience. Nothing could be further from the mind or the intention of the Home Secretary, and I claim that as he has received in Parliament approbation of his action from the Solicitor-General of the late Government, we stand on exceedingly good ground even when we have to meet so formidable an antagonist as the noble and learned Earl opposite.

I wish that I could stop my argument at the point that I have reached, but I would not be doing my duty, as representing the Foreign Office in this House, if I attempted to conceal from your Lordships that there is another aspect of this question. The Home Secretary was exposed, before he issued these amended regulations, to the attacks of those who suggested that he was indifferent to the right of asylum, and to the attacks of those who sympathised especially with all those complicated movements which at this moment are disturbing so many parts of the world. But there is another aspect of this question and quite as serious a one. I remember the late Sir William Harcourt used to be very fond of laughing at what he called grandmotherly legislation—the covering of the Statute Books with unnecessary laws which did no good and which often worked out in directions which no one expected, and created difficulties which no one foresaw. If I had to criticise this Act again I should renew the criticism I ventured to make upon it last year. This Act is creating difficulties of quite a different kind from those we have so far heard of, and it would not be right of me to leave entirely the brunt of the attack which has come from the other side to the defence of my noble friend who represents the Home Office, because there is a Foreign Office side to this question.

I alluded just now to the fact that I thought it unfortunate that the Amendments which your Lordships placed on the Paper were never brought forward. I remember that when the Bill was discussed on Second Reading Lord Spencer, whose absence and its cause we all so deeply regret, asked what was the real meaning of sub-section (a) of section 1. And that really is the Act, or rather it is the fighting part of the Act around which all these controversies have arisen. We pressed for an explanation as to what was meant by the words—

> "A person having the means decently to support himself and his family."

If a man arrived whose arms were strong, whose legs were strong, whose digestion was good, whose head was clear, and who happened not to have £5 in his pocket, was that man, we asked, to be rejected on the ground that he had not the means to decently support himself? And was a man of doubtful health and whose constitution was undermined to be admitted merely because he had borrowed £5 from someone? We were unable to get an answer to those questions. But when the Bill was discussed in your Lordships' House the Government said that under those circumstances the man would not be excluded. My noble friend the present First Lord of the Admiralty expressed the same doubts which Mr. Asquith and Sir Charles Dilke have expressed in the House of Commons. He said he hoped there would be an opportunity of clearing the matter up in Committee, and no doubt it might have been cleared up in Committee, but your Lordships never had the opportunity. Owing to words of such dangerous legal laxity being used, I am sorry to say that troubles have arisen frequently, and are likely, I am afraid, to recur, quite apart from the question of Russian refugees or persons arriving in a verminous state. They are arising at these ports in regard to persons whom I am perfectly certain the late Government never intended to be annoyed under this Act.

I do not for a moment insinuate that any of these evil results came within the minds of noble Lords opposite; but although the Act has been in operation only a few weeks the Foreign Office continues to receive a great number of complaints in regard to the inequalities and the injustices, and, indeed, in some cases almost the cruelties, which arise in some instances under the Act. We have had complaints from Norway in regard to fishermen, whalers, workmen and others who come to this country on temporary jobs, and into whose occupation uncertainty has been introduced. We have had complaints also from Norway in regard to fish packers and others engaged in industries which bring them temporarily to this country, and bring them very often with not a penny in their pockets, and the immigration board have considered it their duty to subject them to all the inconveniences of examination and the delays under the Act. We had the case, to which publicity has been given in the newspapers, of ship-wrecked Americans. Ship-wrecked men have in all ages been the special object of protection; but it was found to be the duty of the immigration board to deal in an exceedingly harsh manner with these Americans, and the American Consul had to intervene to get them out of durance vile and had to guarantee a certain sum of money out of his own pocket before the men were released. Then there was the case of the French onion dealers.

I am not here to pass censure on the immigration boards. They have done their very best to administer the Act judiciously, fairly, and in a sympathetic spirit, but they are in an unfortunate position. They are not a court of law and have none of the machinery which a court of law has to extract evidence and to test it. They have not, like petty sessions, an experienced chairman and clerk to advise them. Therefore I do not attack them if, in administering the Act, they have been, here and there, in pursuance of the Act, the unintentional means of inflicting hardship on people; but that hardship has been inflicted there can be no doubt. We are in the region of the unexpected. We at the Foreign Office have no security from day to day that we shall not have complaints, unofficial complaints as yet, but nevertheless complaints which cause discontent, and which, if they are allowed to go on, may in some cases in the end cause serious trouble.

There was one particularly touching and painful case. It was the case in January in which two French girls of good position, belonging to families in France perfectly well known, were concerned. They were returning to England, one of them as a governess in a school and the other as a pupil, and they were subjected to such delays and annoyances at Folkstone—they were detained on the boat, then bundled on shore to be examined—that they were almost wild with terror, and the younger girl, twelve years of age, arrived in London in a condition almost dying with cold and hunger. I do not want to exaggerate, but owing to the unexpected operation of this Act of Parliament, which was placed on the Statute Book in a desperate hurry, we live at the Foreign Office from day to day in fear that we may have fresh additions to these complaints. Therefore, I do earnestly pray that my noble friend, who has himself taken an honourable part in diplomacy in former days, and other noble Lords will realise our difficulties, and not regard this as a high-handed attempt by the Home Secretary to override an Act of Parliament.

I feel that we have a full right to call upon noble Lords opposite to give us their assistance, because they themselves were parties to placing upon the Statute Book this Act of Parliament, not in precisely that accurate language, or in that final condition, which they themselves desired. I have to say, in conclusion, with regard to that aspect of the question which more particularly refers to the office I have the honour to represent in this House, that in view of the cases—I have not desired to take up too much of your Lordships' time by referring to others—which I have alluded to, and the fear we have that others like them may arise, it is my duty not to conceal from the House that if, under the new rules and practice introduced by the Home Office, it is not found possible to escape the inconvenience and the complicated controversies which arose immediately on the Act coming into operation, it may become necessary, in the interests of justice and of our good relations with foreign countries, to ask for an Amendment of the Act; and I make that statement with the full authority of the Secretary of State.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: My Lords, the noble Earl the Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has given us a most interesting speech about the weather in January, shipwrecked mariners and onion sellers, in whom he appears to be very much interested. But what he said had really nothing whatever to do with the speech of my noble friend, who introduced this subject this evening, and very little to do with the speech of the noble and learned Earl the late Lord Chancellor. My noble friend who spoke first for the Government, and the noble Lord who has just sat down, took a somewhat unusual course in their statement of the Government's case this evening. They have both alluded at great length to things which happened in the other House of Parliament. Your Lordships are generally tolerant, I know, as to what speakers say, and no one has enjoyed that tolerance more than I have; but if your Lordships have permitted noble Lords opposite to refer to what was said by Sir Edward Carson in the other House of Parliament, I would ask you to allow me to remind you under what circumstances his statement was made.

The subject came on in the House of Commons, and the Secretary of State for the Home Department made exactly the same defence as was made by my noble friend Lord Beauchamp. He talked about the immigration boards, but said not one word about the immigration officers. That is our whole case. We have no objection to the letter addressed to the immigration boards. We have the strongest possible objection to the instructions issued to the immigration officers; and my learned friend Sir Edward Carson, as I understand, got up after the speech of the Secretary of State for the Home Department and said that he thought his course had been perfectly correct. That was agreed. Nobody objects to what has been written by the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the immigration boards.

My noble and learned friend behind me, Lord Halsbury, put a legal Question which I think merits an Answer from some legal Member of His Majesty's Government. I say this in no disparaging spirit of the noble Lord. Can you tell us straight that in your opinion the word "must," which occurs in the instructions to the immigration officers, is not contrary to the spirit of the Act of Parliament, which placed the onus of proof on the immigrant? That is the keynote of our contention, and that Question has not been answered by any legal Member of your Lordships' House, though there are legal Members opposite both in the Government and supporting the Government. I do not wish to say any more in enforcing that point. Is the word "must" in strict conformity with the Act of Parliament?

EARL BEAUCHAMP: The word "must" does not occur anywhere in the Order.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: I am extremely glad to hear it; but it occurs twice in the Home Secretary's Answer given in the House of Commons.

LORD FITZMAURICE: I read the actual document to the House just now. The word "must" is not in it. The words are "will be allowed."

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE: Is there really very much difference? Where any doubt exists as to the truth of the allegation, leave to land "will" be given to the immigrant. The Secretary of State says to his subordinates that leave will be given. It is exactly the same thing. I am much obliged to noble Lords opposite for their correction, and I repeat the Question which has been put to them by the noble and learned Earl behind me. The concluding remarks of the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs contained an announcement, upon the obtaining of which I congratulate my noble friend behind me. The noble Lord suggested that it may be necessary to amend this Act. I wonder if he means, so far as this particular point is concerned, to repeal it. It is because we have been suspecting that the Government have all along intended to repeal it, but that in this particular case they have not taken the course of introducing a repealing Act, but have altered the regulations, that we have felt it right to make a solemn protest against what has been done. I hope we shall have a straight answer to the legal point raised by my noble and learned friend behind me.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord LOREBURN): My Lords, I should have had the greatest pleasure in rising immediately after the noble and learned Earl, who asked a legal Question, had I had an opportunity of considering this point more fully. In point of fact, I had no notice that this legal Question was going to be brought forward, and I do not think it is possible or right for me, after hearing words read out from instructions that I have never seen, in reference to an Act which I do not know by heart, to offer a legal opinion on the merits of these matters. I shall, however, have the greatest pleasure in giving such opinion after I have had an opportunity of looking into them.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, after what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, of course the House will wait with respect and anxious patience to hear his interpretation of the word "prove." I merely rise to ask one or two Questions with regard to matters of fact which I do not think have been answered. A few moments ago, Lord Beauchamp, and, I think, the Under-Secretary for Foreign Affairs, both said that the word "must" was not used in Mr. Gladstone's instructions to the immigration officers. I have in my hand a copy, verified by Mr. Gladstone's private secretary, of the words he used in the debate, and they run as follows—

> "Finally, I have issued to all the immigration officers instructions that in all cases in which immigrants coming from ports of the Continent which are at present in a disturbed condition allege that they are flying from religious or political persecution, and if there is a doubt, where any doubt exists as to the truth of the allegation it must be allowed, and leave to land must be given."

Therefore, my Lords, there is no doubt whatever that Mr. Gladstone's order in that respect to the immigration officers was most peremptory. I wish to ask Lord Beauchamp whether he will lay on the Table the Report of the Committee. All that has been said to-night by way of explanation of this alteration is that it was made owing to a difficulty with some onion sellers and certain Scandinavian seamen who were going to join their ships

LORD FITZMAURICE: I did not say that at all. On the contrary, I said that that part of my observations was entirely opening up a different chapter from that which had led to the alteration. I pointed out that Mr. Gladstone in another place had had to reply to attacks directed mainly by friends of these immigrants who claimed to be political refugees, and when I brought forward these other cases I was putting before your Lordships a chapter of events which I myself said was quite different.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: I accept the explanation. In that case we have had no reason given to us why the number was changed from twelve to twenty.

LORD FITZMAURICE: That was stated by my noble friend Lord Beauchamp.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Then it was Lord Beauchamp who spoke about the onion sellers and the Scandinavian seamen.

LORD FITZMAURICE: No; I referred to them.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Lord Beauchamp, so far, has given us no other reason except that of these unfortunate men. What we want to know is the reason why the number was changed to twenty. We want to see the documents and the advice which Mr. Gladstone received when he made that change, because, whatever may have been his reasons, and however good they may have been, the result has been most unfortunate. The Act is now made absolutely inoperative by the increase of the number to twenty. I shall be very glad to know if we are to have that Report.

THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, I do not wish to prolong this discussion for more than a few minutes, but there were some remarks made by the noble Earl opposite to which I cannot help referring. I am not at all surprised that the noble Earl should object on this occasion to references to what passed in the House of Commons, because no doubt the speech of Sir Edward Carson is an extremely awkward one for those who take the same line as the noble Earl. There may be some irregularities in these allusions, though they are constantly made in this House. It is the practice, when these things have passed into the pages of Hansard, constantly to allude to them. I think it would be impossible to carry on debates in both Houses of Parliament on the strict rule that neither House should refer to proceedings which had taken place in the other.

I say it with all respect, but I do not think the noble Earl quite gave a fair account of what Sir Edward Carson said. We laymen are placed in a position of great difficulty when we find such eminent lawyers as the late Lord-Chancellor and the late Solicitor-General taking entirely different views of this subject. I find, on reference to Hansard, that Sir Edward Carson in the debate said that when a Question was put on the matter to the Home Secretary on the previous night he, from only a cursory examination, formed the opinion that the right hon. Gentleman was, by the powers conferred upon him, interfering with the Statute passed in the previous session; but that having heard the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman he found that he had come to an absolutely erroneous conclusion in that respect. It is therefore obvious that Sir Edward Carson had considered the subject very carefully, and felt himself bound to admit that he had, in the first instance, formed a judgment he now believed to be erroneous. The noble Earl said that Sir Edward Carson made no allusion to the circular issued to the immigation officers. But Sir Edward's language on this point was very remarkable. He said—

> "The Home Secretary had told the immigration officers that in the cases in which they were in any doubt as to whether an alien was a political or a religious refugee, they ought to give him the benefit of the doubt. He (Sir Edward Carson) himself would have thought that that was the duty of the immigration officers without any instructions whatever. That was an ordinary rule in the administration of Acts of Parliament."

That is a pretty strong opinion upon the very point which the noble Earl seemed to think Sir Edward Carson had given no opinion at all. I therefore venture to say that whatever weight we are to give to the opinion of the late Solicitor-General, we are entitled to claim him as an undoubted witness in favour of the legal correctness of the conduct of my right hon. friend, Mr. Herbert Gladstone, in the matter.

LORD NEWTON: I should like to press for a Reply to my Question as to the production of the Report. Are we to have the Report?

EARL BEAUCHAMP: No. The Home Secretary in another place has already refused, on principle, to lay on the Table a confidential document from a Committee of the Department. He has, however, laid on the Table the rules and orders and also a memorandum on the working of the Act, which contains the gist of the Committee's Report. The Report itself will not be laid, largely because it contains certain references to salary to be paid to people and other matters of that kind.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Then how are we to learn the reasons which induced the Secretary of State to change his mind?

EARL BEAUCHAMP: I have done my best to state those reasons to the House to-night.

House adjourned at half-past Seven o'clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

Barrack Accommodation in the Punjab.

Mr. C. J. O'DONNELL (Newington, Walworth): To ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state the necessity of moving a Moplah regiment last winter from the hot, humid climate of South Western Madras, where it was recruited, to Dera Ghazi Khan, in the Punjab, where the temperature was under freezing point when it arrived; what was the barrack accommodation prepared for this regiment; and whether 400 out of its strength of 820 men were in hospital a few weeks afterwards.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) The 78th Moplah Rifles was moved in relief to Dera Ghazi Khan in September, 1905. I am unable to answer the rest of the Question without a reference to India.

Defence of India's North-West Frontier.

Mr. C. J. O'DONNELL: To ask the Secretary of State for War if he will lay upon the Table of the House the scheme of Lord Kitchener for the defence of the North-West Frontier of India, or such an outline of it as will enable this House to judge whether an outlay of £9,000,000 is being efficiently incurred; and whether he will guarantee that the soldiers of the Native Army, Sikhs, Brahmins, Rajputs, Gurkhas, Biluchis, and others, will not be employed on work such as building, which, according to their customs, they regard as servile and derogatory to their caste feelings.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) The scheme is under the consideration of the Government, and I hope to be able, in the annual survey of Indian affairs, to give such an outline as the hon. Member desires, so far as the public interest permits. I am assured that there is no intention whatever to employ soldiers of the Native Army on work derogatory to their caste feeling.

Chatham Dockyard—Discharges of Workmen.

Mr. E. H. LAMB (Rochester): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether any further reduction in the number of men employed at Chatham Dockyard is contemplated during the ensuing year; and, if so, what number; and whether time can be allowed for any such reduction to be accomplished by ordinary normal wastage instead of by fresh discharges.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) A further reduction in numbers of men at Chatham dockyard is rendered necessary by the programme of work for the ensuing financial year. It is contemplated that some 425 men in all will be affected, but it is hoped, in adjusting trades, to find employment at other yards for some 225 of these. It is not practicable to bring about the reduction of staff wholly by natural wastage, but allowance has been made for this method to operate to the fullest possible extent.

Ballynahinch Postal Arrangements.

Mr. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Postmaster-General if he will give instructions for the letter-box at Ballyna, hinch to be cleared each morning previous to the mails being sent out, so as to expedite the delivery of letters in the surrounding towns.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The box in question is cleared every morning in time for the letters to be included in the early despatches made to the surrounding district, and in the despatch to Belfast at 10 a.m.

Muckamore Mails.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that on 1st October last the 9 a.m. mail despatched from Muckamore was withdrawn and a despatch at 7.20 p.m. substituted, with inconvenience to the inhabitants of the district; and whether, seeing that the 9 a.m. despatch was established for thirty years, and a memorial has been presented for its continuance, he will consider the advisability of restoring the morning despatch.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) There was reason to believe at the time when the change referred to was introduced that it would be acceptable to the residents generally; but I will have further inquiry made, and, if I find that the new arrangement is not giving satisfaction, I will consider the question of reverting to the old arrangement.

Discharged Soldiers as Vagrants.

SIR J. DICKSON-POYNDER (Wiltshire, Chippenham): To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Department have Returns showing the number of vagrants relieved in each Poor Law area in 1905 or 1904, and the proportion of them who were discharged soldiers; and, if so, whether he will cause such information to be made public.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The Returns as to pauperism in England and Wales, which are published half-yearly, show the number of vagrants relieved in each Poor Law union on the 1st January and the 1st July in each year. The last of these Returns which has been published relates to the enumeration taken on July 1st, 1905. I have no Returns showing the proportion of the vagrants relieved in 1904 and 1905 who were discharged soldiers. The latest Parliamentary Return on this subject of which I am aware is one which was made in 1898 by the War Office, and which related to the number of discharged soldiers relieved on December 20th, 1897.

Scottish Fishery Board—Members' Fees.

MR. WATT (Glasgow College): To ask the Secretary for Scotland if he will state the sums received from the Treasury for fees and expenses by each of the members of the Scottish Fishery Board during each of the years 1900–1905.

Indian Finance.

Dr. RUTHERFORD (Middlesex, Brentford): To ask the Secretary of State for India, if he will consider the suggestion of the Royal Commission, over which Lord Welby presided, that the financial year for India should end on the 31st December instead of the 31st March, in order that the actual result of the expired year might take the place of the revised estimate which is now presented, and in order that the Indian accounts might be laid before this House at an earlier date, and an earlier discussion of Indian finance thus be made possible.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) On reference to Parliamentary Paper 169, of 1902, the hon. Member will find that the suggestion was fully considered in 1900 and 1901, and that the Government of India drew attention to the administrative inconvenience that would result from the adoption of the course proposed in paragraph 69 of the Report of the Royal Commission, viz., that the Budget should be introduced two or three months after the beginning of the financial year to which it relates. It was accordingly decided to make no change. As at present advised, I do not propose to modify this decision.

Irish Land Judge's Court.

Mr. GINNELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the number and aggregate annual rental of estates now in the Land Judge's Court in Ireland in respect of which an absolute order for sale has been made and receivers appointed; have their holdings on all those estates been offered at a fair price to the tenants as required by statute; have the offers of the tenants been rejected on other grounds than that of value; will the Land Judge be asked to furnish particulars of all those insolvent properties to the Estates Commissioners; and will the Commissioners intervene under Section 8 of the Regulations now in force.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) A Return, No. 256, of the estates for sale in the Land Judge's Court over which receivers have been appointed was last year laid upon the Table pursuant to an Order of this House. This Return dealt with the estates in Court on 31st December, 1904. I am informed that the Land Judge has ordered a similar Return for the year ending 31st December, 1905, to be prepared, and there will be no objection to laying this Return upon the Table if it should be moved for. The learned Judge informs me that a great number of the estates in his Court have been sold under Section 40 of the Land Act of 1896 and Section 7 of the Act of 1903; and a still larger number have been sold by mutual agreement between the parties under the supervision of the Court. Many cases have been dismissed out of Court on the consent of the parties. A considerable number of the estates remaining in Court are non-agricultural. In all other cases every possible step has, I am informed, been taken to bring the estate to sale. In no case, so far as is remembered, has the tenant's offer been rejected on grounds other than that of value, and rarely for that reason. The Land Judge is prepared to furnish the Return mentioned to the Estate Commissioners. Section 8 of the Regulations referred to applies to cases in which differences as to terms of sale exist between landlord and tenant, and is not applicable to cases in the Land Judge's Court.

Functions of the Land Judge's Court.

Mr. GINNELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what has been the gross cost to the State, year by year, of the Land Judge's Court in Ireland since its establishment, including every office and position whatsoever appertaining thereto, are the functions of that Court analogous to those of a Bankruptcy Court; what statutory authority, if any, does that Court possess for refusing to sell insolvent property at its value, assuming to itself the role of a permanent landlord, and appointing and maintaining permanent land agents under the name of receivers; and whether, seeing that Parliament has repeatedly ordered the insolvent estates in that Court to be sold, what steps does His Majesty's Government propose to take to expedite this work.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that the cost to the State of the Land Judge's Court can be ascertained by a reference to the Estimates from year to year, but it should be remembered that the cost is diminished by the duties levied, in pursuant of statute, on sales made and accounts passed by the Court. The Land Judge informs me that the functions of his Court are in no way analogous to those of a Bankruptcy Court; that the Court has never refused to sell insolvent property at its value, and has never assumed the role of a permanent landlord or appointed permanent land agents as receivers. The learned judge adds that his tribunal has been always kept busy, and that nothing has been left undone to clear the Court of the estates under its jurisdiction. those which had accumulated in it during the last thirty years having amounted to almost one-fourth of the whole of Ireland.

Case of Patrick Murphy.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, if he can state the nature of the offence preferred by the Crown against Patrick Murphy, in March 1898, in which Sergeant Sheridan was the principal witness; and will he say whether Murphy pleaded guilty.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that the charge preferred by the Crown against Patrick Murphy was that of maliciously maiming an ass. Murphy eventually pleaded guilty at the assizes, but it is only right to add that, at the prior magisterial investigation, he strongly asserted his innocence, and that when arraigned before the court of assize he first pleaded not guilty, but finally pleaded guilty upon the advice of his friends, who suggested to him that the evidence against him, which was principally that of Sheridan, was very strong, and that if he should plead guilty he would probably get off with a lighter sentence.

Sergeant Sheridan, ex R.I.C.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, if he can say on what date was Sergeant Sheridan dismissed from the force; what was the date of the secret police inquiry held to inquire into the case of Patrick Murphy; on what grounds or information was this inquiry ordered; and what are the names of the officers who conducted it.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that Sergeant Sheridan was dismissed from the Royal Irish Constabulary on the 9th February, 1901. The police inquiry into the cases of Patrick Murphy and others was directed by the late Government on the 18th May, 1901, and the inquiry was held between that date and the 15th July, 1901, when the Report of the inquiry was received by the Government. The grounds for holding the inquiry were fully stated in this House by the right hon. Member for Dover on the 23rd July, 1902.† Briefly, the object of the inquiry was to make reparation, if that were possible, to Murphy and others in the event of its being shown that they had been improperly convicted upon the false evidence of Sheridan and others. The officers who conducted the inquiry were District Inspectors Morrison and Hobbins of the Royal Irish Constabulary.

Constable Anderson, R.I.C.

MR. SLOAN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, if he can say whether Constable Anderson gave evidence in any case in which Sergeant Sheridan was concerned, except in the case of Patrick Murphy; did Anderson receive any gratuity or inducement from the authorities for the evidence he gave at the secret or any other inquiry in connection with Murphy's case, and, if so, what; and whether he will lay a copy of Anderson's evidence upon the Table.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that Constable Anderson gave evidence in only one case in which Sergeant Sheridan was concerned, in addition to the case of Patrick Murphy. In that case, which was one of larceny from the person, the accused was acquitted. Constable Anderson received no gratuity or inducement to give evidence at the inquiry, beyond the assurance that if he should tell the truth he would not suffer. The Answer to the final inquiry is in the negative.

Gun Licences in Tipperary—Jeremiah O'Dwyer's Case.

Mr. KENDAL O'BRIEN (Tipperary, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Jeremiah O'Dwyer, District Councillor, of Mohorough, Cappawhite, county Tipperary, who farms ninety acres of land, was refused a gun-carrying licence by the local resident magistrate, Mr. H. Turner; whether he can state the grounds of the magistrate's refusal; and whether, seeing that it is usual, except in very special cases, to give farmers the means of protecting, their crops from vermin by the use of firearms, and that O'Dwyer's application has been supported by at least one of the local justices, he will advise the resident magistrate to grant the licence in this case.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I understand that the fact is as stated in the first part of the Question. A discretionary power in regard to the issue of licences under the Peace Preservation Act is vested in the resident magistrate, who is the licensing officer for the district, and it would be contrary to practice to state the grounds of the magistrate's refusal in any case. I presume there were special reasons why the licence should not be granted in this case; and I am not aware of any reason why the discretion vested in the resident magistrate should be interfered with.

Irish Surveyors of Buildings.

Mr. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, whether a candidate for the position of surveyor of buildings has to be nominated by the Board of Public Works, Ireland, before he can compete; whether nominations for those appointments are practically in the hands of the secretary; and whether he can explain how it happens that, out of a total staff of nineteen surveyors of buidings at present employed by this department, eighteen are of the same religious denomination.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The reply to the first part of the Question is in the affirmative, to the second in the negative, the nominations are not in the hands of the Secretary but of the Commissioners, who personally examine into the qualifications of each candidate, and nominate several candidates for each vacancy. As regards the third part of the Question, the Board have no knowledge of the religious denomination of their surveying staff; they do not inquire into it.

Dooner Estate, Queen's County.

Mr. MEEHAN (Queen's County, Leix): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, whether he is aware if an application has been made by the owner for sale to the tenants of the Dooner Estate, Ballyroan, Queen's County; whether the application of Peter Singleton, an evicted tenant, to get back his former holding has been considered; and, if so, can he state the result.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that proceedings for the sale of this estate have been instituted before them, and that the case of Peter Singleton, who has applied for reinstatement as an evicted tenant, will be considered at the earliest opportunity.

Irish Butter Industry.

Mr. A. ROCHE (Cork): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what has been the value of the total amount of butter produced in Ireland in the year 1905; how much of it was produced in the centrifugal factories; what financial aid has his Department given to this branch of the trade; how many of its officers are employed or engaged in furthering this work, and at what cost; and what aid, if any, financial or otherwise, has his Department given towards improving the quality of the remaining quantity of butter produced in the farmers' dairies.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The value of the butter produced in Ireland in 1905 is estimated by the Department of Agriculture at 5¼ millions sterling. There are no means at present of estimating the proportion produced in centrifugal factories. Five officers of the Department are engaged in furthering the butter industry, mainly on its creamery side, namely, two in general inspection of creameries, two instructors in creamery management, and one clerk. The total cost of these officers amounts to about £1,930 per annum. Loans to the amount of £4,840 (of which £2,996 have been repaid) have been issued for the erection of Pasteurising plant in creameries. With regard to the production of butter in farmers' dairies, provision has been made during the current year (1905–6) by twenty-five county committees of agriculture for the employment of thirty itinerant instructors in butter making at a total cost of £3,530, of which the Department will contribute £2,017. Instruction in home dairying is also given at each of the following rural domestic economy schools under the Department or county schemes: Munster Institute, Dunmanway, Portumna, Loughglynn, Westport. The cost of the instruction in butter making cannot be conveniently separated from that of the other instruction in these schools. Other officers of the Department, namely, four transit inspectors one inspector for the detection of frauds, and two inspectors under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts, are partly employed in the interests of the Irish butter industry.

Evicted Farms in County Kerry.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL (Kerry, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners have sent an inspector to visit the farms of the following evicted tenants: Michael O'Sullivan, Doaghs, Glenbeigh, and Daniel Murphy, Dromin, Killorglin, both of county Kerry; and, if not, whether a man will be sent down at once to report fully as to their condition and as to the possibility of reinstating them.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the Estates Commissioners that they have received applications for reinstatement from the two evicted tenants named, and that they will make inquiry into the case of these and other evicted tenants as soon as possible.

Fenit Pier.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland what is the amount of the original loan for the construction of Fenit pier; how much was given as a free grant; what is the rate of interest, sinking fund, and period of repayment; whether he is aware that the Royal Commission (Allport Commission), appointed in 1886, recommended grants in aid of Irish harbours to the extent of £400,000 specifying Fenit and Rosslare as first entitled; whether the full amount of the loan is part of local loans stock bearing interest at 3 per cent.; what would be the difference annually between the interest at 3 per cent.; and the rate at present charged; what would be the amount of that difference from the commencement of the loan to the present day at 2½ per cent. compound interest; whether in the construction of any other pier in Ireland since 1881 interest at so high a rate was charged; and whether steps will be taken to give credit to the guaranteeing baronies for the profit made by the Treasury on this loan from the commencement to the present day, and also to reduce the rate of interest to be paid henceforth.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) (1) Amount of original loan, £95,000. (2) No grant was made. (3, 4, and 5) The loan is repayable by an annuity of £5 1s. per cent. per annum for forty years, which includes interest at 4 per cent. (6) The Allport Commission recommended the grant of £400,000 for the provision of proper harbour accommodation available for fishery and general purposes. They specified, amongst objects that should take precedence, Rosslare and Fenit for grants in aid of the extension of the piers at these places, under (b) of their recommendations (pages 22 and 23 of the Report). (7) The loan was advanced out of the Consolidated Fund, now represented by Local Loans Stock. (8) The loan being repayable by way of annuity, the interest in each instalment is not a fixed proportion, but decreases with each payment. The average annual interest received on the loan amounts to £2,817. If the loan had been made at

3 per cent. the average annual interest would amount to £2,113. (9) The difference, £704, annually accumulated at 2½ per cent. would amount to £22,773. (10) The minimum rate of interest charged for loans for the construction of piers and harbours in the period from 1881 to 1897 was 4 per cent. Since 1897 the rates have been varied from time to time in the case of loans secured on local rates, the present rate for such a loan for forty years being 4 per cent. (11, 12) In the circumstances the Treasury cannot reduce the rate of interest or grant any remission in respect of past payments.

West Kerry Fishing Industry.

MR. THOMAS O'DONNELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the number of boats and men employed in the fishing industry along the West Kerry coast, from Brandon to Dingle which industry is the main if not the only industry along this entire district; whether he is aware that the coast is a dangerous one, rendering the landing of fish difficult; and whether, seeing that repeated applications have been made by the fishermen for better piers, an inspector will be immediately sent down to report on the piers, the boats, and fishing gear, protection from steam trawlers, methods of curing, etc., with a view to more thoroughly develop and protect this industry.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that the number of vessels and men employed in the fishing industry in the district referred to are about 340 and 1,100 respectively. Apart from such agriculture as can be carried on in a rough and mountainous region, fishing is the main industry in that district. The coast is admittedly a dangerous one, but the facilities for landing have been improved by the construction of piers and slips. The district is partly within and partly without the congested districts. The Congested Districts Board have improved Brandon Pier and placed a light there, built a pier and made an approach road at Brandon Creek, made a landing at Smerwick Harbour, and built a pier at Dunquin, the total cost of these works being over £2,600. The Board have also offered £400 towards the cost of dredging Dingle Harbour. A slip at Minard has also been made at the joint expense of the Department of Agriculture and the county. It is not considered necessary to send an inspector to report upon the matters referred to in the concluding part of the Question, as to which the Department and the Congested Districts Board have full information. If any specific application in reference to these matters should be made to either body, it will receive careful attention. The enforcement of the bylaws relating to trawling along this coast, is carried out as part of the general scheme for the protection of Irish fisheries. I am informed that there is no part of Ireland where the curing of mackerel is better understood.

Lamberts' Minors Estate, Athenry.

MR. DUFFY (Galway, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether negotiations have been going on for some time between the receiver and the agricultural tenants on the estate of the Lamberts' Minors, near Athenry, for the sale to the tenants of their holdings; can he say what was the price demanded from the tenants, as also what offer was made by the tenants; and whether, having regard to the fact that the receiver is now suing the tenants for rent and arrears for the purpose of forcing them into agreements, he will ask the Estates Commissioners to offer their friendly offices to try and bring about a just and honourable settlement.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that the estate in question is not for sale in the Land Judge's Court, but is, however, managed by the Land Judge on behalf of the Lord-Chancellor, who has given permission to the receiver to negotiate for a sale to the tenants. I am informed that the terms of sale offered to first term tenants were twenty-one and half years purchase, which would give a reduction of 6s. in the pound; and to second term tenants twenty-four and two-thirds years purchase, which would give a reduction of 4s. in the pound. The tenants have offered eighteen and one-half years and twenty-one and one-half years purchase, respectively, which offers were considered entirely inadequate. The receiver is not suing for the recovery of rent, but has called upon the tenants to pay the half year's rent due on 1st May, 1905. The case does not appear to be one in which the Estates Commissioners could intervene under Section 8 of the regulations.

Clonkeen Evicted Tenant.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can say if the Land Judge gave his consent to the eviction of Joseph Brooks and his family, of Clonkeen, Queen's County, which was carried out by the receiver, Mr. Kennedy Mullingar, last month; and whether, as other evictions are threatened on the M'Neale estate, the Estates Commissioners will intervene to effect a settlement, proposals to purchase their holdings by the tenants having broken down.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the Registrar of the Land Judge's Court that, so far as he can ascertain, no proceedings for the sale of the estate referred to are pending in that court. The Estates Commissioners have no information in the matter, but if any application should be made to them by any of the persons concerned they will consider whether the matter is one in which they can properly intervene.

Kiltullagh Branch of the United Irish League.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that John Murphy, of Kiltullagh, county Galway, received a letter on the 3rd instant threatening him with death if he continued to work for Michael Forde, of Kilarriff, who is boycotted because he refused to give up, at the request of the Kiltullagh branch of the United Irish League, a farm purchased by him under the Ashbourne Act; and whether he proposes to take any action in the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the police authorities that on the date mentioned a threatening notice directed against John Murphy was found on the roadside. The notice, which alleged that Murphy was a supporter of Michael Forde, appeared to have been exposed to the weather for a considerable time, the paper and ink being much faded. Murphy has not been employed by Forde for the past year. Forde was at one time unpopular because he had purchased a portion of grazing farm, but he is not now boycotted as stated in the Question.

Agrarian Outrage at Pollnashinnagh.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on the night of 12th February last eleven tons of hay belonging to Captain Persse was maliciously burned at Pollnashinnagh near Kilchreest, county Galway; whether the police have discovered the person responsible for this; and, if not, what steps are being taken to protect property in this district.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The fact is as stated in the first part of the Question. The police have not yet succeeded in discovering the offender. They are fully alive to their duty as regards the protection of property.

Irish School Grants—Report of Inter-Departmental Committee.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Report of the Inter-Departmental Committee of 1902 on School Grants in Ireland has ever been made public; and, if not, whether he will now lay it upon the Table, together with the decision of the Government and the Treasury on it.

(Answered by McKenna.) The Report referred to was a confidential document, and the late Government decided that it should not be published. I do not feel able to take any different view of the matter.

Rossmore Evicted Tenants.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, County W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Estates Commissioners will inquire into all the circumstances connected with the eviction of Mrs. Evans from her farm at Rossmore, Durrus, county Cork, which is to be sold by public auction on the 26th instant.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that purchase agreements for three holdings at Rossmore, on the estate of Lord Bandon, have been signed and lodged with them by William Kearney, who, the Commissioners understand, has now advertised these farms for sale by public auction, subject to the annuity of £15 19s. 2d. payable to the Land Commission. The Commissioners have no power to interfere with the sale by Kearney of his interest in these holdings, nor could they purchase them subject to the annuity. They will, however, inquire into the circumstances of the eviction of Mrs. Evans at the earliest opportunity.

Sale of Kearney's Farms.

MR. GILHOOLY: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether the attention of the Congested Districts Board has been called to the proposed sale, on the 26th instant, of three farms at Rossmore, Durrus, county Cork, by Mr. William Kearney, who holds the fee simple of them; and whether, seeing that three tenants on adjacent estates are willing to migrate to these holdings and surrender their farms, in order to enlarge other holdings on the Bird, Beamish, and O'Donovan estates, urge the Congested Districts Board to buy Mr. Kearney's interest.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Congested Districts Board are making inquiries into this matter with the object of considering whether they will make an offer for the purchase of the farms referred to.

Tenant Farmers and the Land Sub-Commission.

MR. HAMMOND (Carlow): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland is he aware that a feeling prevails amongst the tenant farmers, over a large area of Ireland, for the re-adoption of the former practice of having two lay members on each Land Sub-Commission, one of whom should be a practical tenant-farmer enjoying the confidence of his own class; and, if so, whether he will introduce a reform in the personnel of the Sub-Commission, so that the tenant should enjoy a proportional representation thereon.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am not aware that there is any widespread desire for a reversion to the former practice of having two lay Assistant Commissioners in each Sub-Commission. The present system was provided by the Act of 1903, and until His Majesty's present Government have gained more experience of the working of that Act I am not prepared to make any statement as to possible legislation.

Library Buildings in Dublin.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is now in a position to state what decision has been arrived at by the Committee appointed by the Treasury, early in 1905, to consider the question of accommodation in the library buildings, Dublin, now under the control of the Department of Agriculture; and whether he is aware of the increasing demand for accommodation, seeing that a great number of publications have been acquired during recent years, and that the usefulness of the library is shown by the increase in the daily average of attendances, from 528 in 1899 to 677 in 1905.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) The decision of the Committee cannot be explained within the limits of an Answer to a Question, but I shall be happy to give the hon. Member what information I can if he will communicate with me in writing. The facts stated in the second part of the Question are correct.

Intermediate Education Examination Programme.

MR. McKEAN (Monaghan, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the unpunctuality of the Intermediate Education Board in publishing the annual programme of examinations has been complained of by head masters and teachers for some years past; whether he will urge on the Board the necessity of publishing the programme early in April, as was originally the practice; and whether he will further represent to the Board the inconvenience to schools and teachers occasioned by prescribing for study text books which at the time have not been edited or published.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the Intermediate Education Board that they have not undertaken to publish their rules and programme for any year at any fixed date, and that consequently no question of punctuality arises. It is expected that the rules and programme for the year 1907 will be ready for publication next month. The Board are taking steps to obviate the inconvience referred to in the concluding part of the Question.

Militia Bands.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the cost of maintaining the bands of Militia regiments falls very heavily on the officers; and whether, therefore, he is prepared to increase substantially the allowance now made for that purpose.

(Answered by Mr. Haldane.) The present band allowance of £25 was granted in 1899. No complaints, of the nature alluded to in the Question, have reached the War Office. No increase of the allowance is at present contemplated.

Militia Officers' Chargers.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY: To ask the Secretary of State for War if he is prepared to extend to mounted officers of Militia regiments the same privileges as to the provision of, or allowance for, chargers as are enjoyed by officers of other branches of the Service.

(Answered by Mr. Haldane.) The grant of such a privilege would involve considerable expenditure, for which at the present time there is no money available. I am afraid, therefore, that I cannot undertake to make the concession suggested by the hon. and gallant Member.

Dalston Barracks.

MR. T. HART-DAVIES (Hackney, N.): To ask the Secretary of State for War what was the rent formerly paid for the Dalston Barracks of the 7th battalion of the Rifle Brigade; whether the rent was at any time redeemed, and for what sum; also what was the length of the unexpired portion of the lease in 1904, when these barracks were vacated, and for what sum the premises were disposed of by the War Office; and what is the rent now demanded by the purchaser in case it is found advisable to return the battalion to its former quarters.

(Answered by Mr. Haldane.) The original rent was £113 3s. 6d. In 1893 the lease was bought for £3,750, subject to a ground rent of £50. In 1904 there were forty years of the lease to run, and a sum of £1,150 was obtained for the surrender of the lease. No information with regard to the rent that would now be demanded is available.

Volunteer Sergeant Instructors.

MR. STANLEY WILSON (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the sergeant-instructors allowed by Parliament to Volunteer corps are being withdrawn for courses of instruction during the training season (March to September), when they are urgently required with their units; and whether he will issue instructions that they shall only be withdrawn between September and March.

(Answered by Mr. Haldane.) It is left to the discretion of general officers commanding to decide at what time of the year these men shall be attached to a regular unit or depot for period of instruction lasting fourteen days. It is impossible, therefore, to reply to the Question without referring to all general officers commanding, with whose discretion it would not appear expedient to interfere.

Physical Standard for Volunteer and Yeomanry Recruits.

MR. VIVIAN (Birkenhead): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will consider the advisability of now relaxing the regulations as to the physical development and teeth of recruits for the Volunteer and Yeomanry forces.

(Answered by Mr. Haldane.) I am not aware of any reasons for considering that the physical standard laid down for recruits of Imperial Yeomanry and Volunteers is too high, nor does my hon. friend suggest any. As regards teeth there is no fixed standard, and the matter is left to the judgment and discretion of the examining officer.

Macedonian Gendarmerie.

MR. CAMERON CORBETT (Glasgow, Tradeston): To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether satisfactory progress has been made during the past year in the re-organisation of the gendarmerie in Macedonia.

(Answered by Sir Edward Grey.) Information on this subject, more complete than I can give in Answer to a Question, will be contained in the Papers regarding affairs in Macedonia, which will be laid before the House within the next few days.

White Labour in the Australian Gold Mines.

MR. CHARLES McVEIGH (Down, S.): To ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can state what wages are paid to white men employed on the Australian gold mines, and what it costs per ton to mine and mill the ore in each of the States of Western Australia, Victoria, and Queensland; and whether he can state what wages are paid to the Chinamen imported to South Africa, and what it costs to mine and mill the ore per ton on the mines they are employed in on the Transvaal gold fields.

(Answered by Mr. Churchill.) The wages paid to white men employed in Western Australian gold mines appear to vary from a minimum of about 10s. per shift to surface labourers, to a minimum of about 15s. or 16s. for rock-drill men in shafts; men working in wet ground being paid 1s. 8d. per shift in addition to the ordinary rate of pay. In Victoria the wages of surface men vary from £1 to £2 5s. per week, and of miners and pitmen from £2 5s. to £3. The cost of mining and milling varies largely; the average cost of working, per ton, in twenty-two companies in Western Australia in 1905 varied from 16s. 5d. to 38s. 8d.; adding to this the average cost of development, the variation was from 22s. 7d. per ton to over 40s. per ton. The average working costs, per ton, over the whole amount of tons mined and milled, do not appear to be given in the Reports of the States mentioned; but some indication is afforded by the dividends paid. Thus, in Western Australia in 1903, dividends to the amount of £2,024,152 were paid on a total product of the value of £8,770,719, or about one-fourth. The ore value appears to be about one ounce per ton, or about 72s. In Victoria the amount of ore treated was 1,078,433 tons in 1903, and the dividends of the principal lode mines were about £500,000. In Queensland the value of the gold yield of 1904 was £2,714,934 and the dividends paid by gold mining companies amounted to £831,966. The average wages paid to Chinese labourers in the Transvaal were, for the year June, 1904, to June, 1905, £1 13s. 6d. per man per month; for the year 1905 the average monthly wage was £1 17s. 7d. The cost of mining and treating the ore in the Transvaal mines is variable, and no average figures are given by the Mines Department, but the working costs of the subsidiary companies of the Rand Mines, Limited, are cited as representative of the working costs of the gold mines in the Witwatersrand area, and these are £1 2s. 8d. per ton. Every effort has been made by this Department to provide my hon. friend with a full and accurate reply; but I must observe that, having regard to the very complicated and extensive nature of the Question, it would have been more convenient had he found it possible to give me somewhat longer notice.

Stornoway Post Office.

MR. WEIR: To ask the Postmaster-General if he will state the number of letters, inwards and outwards, and parcels, inwards and outwards, at Stornoway post office during the year ending 31st December, 1905, and the corresponding numbers for the year ending 31st December, 1896.

Postal Accommodation in Crossdoney District.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY: To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that a large district, densely populated, in the Crossdoney postal district of Cavan has no postal accommodation other than the mail car driver, who stops to take up letters from the country people between Drumconnick and Crossdoney; and whether, in view of the inconvenience inflicted upon the country people, who have to wait for the uncertain arrival of the mail car, he will give the matter his immediate attention.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I am not aware of the circumstances referred to, but I will have inquiry made on the subject and will acquaint the hon. Member with the result.

Swine Fever.

MR. FIELD: To ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he will state how many cases of swine fever, traceable to Irish pigs, occurred in each particular county of England during each of the six months ending 31st January, 1906.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) The only case of swine fever in England which has been traced to Irish pigs during the six months ending 31st January last, is one of a consignment of pigs sent from Waterford to Cardiff, via Milford, in November last, which were found diseased when exposed for sale in Routh Market, Cardiff, two days later. The safeguards against the introduction of disease provided by the Swine Fever (Movement from Ireland) Order of 1904 were, of course, in operation during the whole of the period.

Caithness Sea Fisheries.

MR. MILDMAY (Devonshire, Totnes): To ask the Secretary for Scotland whether the Government have any intention of acting upon the recommendations of the Departmental Committee on the sea fisheries of Sutherland and Caithness, of which he was a member, and of enabling the fishermen concerned to obtain improved boats by the loan system, so successful in Ireland.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) It is too early to form a definite opinion on the success of the Irish system, and at present the Government do not propose to resume the system of loans to fishermen for this purpose.

Imports of Frozen Meat.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston): To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will say how much frozen mutton and frozen beef were imported during the year 1905 from Australasia and from South America respectively.

Railway Transport of Fruit.

Mr. NAPIER (Kent, Faversham): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, having regard to the recent development of the fruit-growing industry and to the inadequacy of the facilities for transport of fruit on railways, and the rates charged for such transport, the nature of the present classification of goods and their effect upon the Home fruit industry, the Government is prepared at an early date to legislate in the direction of greatly cheapening procedure before the Railway Commission, and giving such Commission power to revise the present classification of goods, and more effectively to deal with rates and facilities.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I may remind my hon. friend that a Committee appointed by the Board of Agriculture has recently reviewed the position of the fruit industry in this country, and reported on the subject last year. The Committee did not think it necessary to recommend legislation of the nature proposed in my hon. friend's Question.

Foreign Seamen on British Vessels.

Mr. HOUSTON (Liverpool, West Toxteth): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been directed to the increase in the employment of Chinese and other foreigners on board British vessels; and whether he will introduce legislation compelling British vessels sailing from British ports to engage British subjects, to the extent of at least 75 per cent. of the total number of the crews.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) My attention has been called to the increase in number of foreigners employed in our mercantile marine. I do not propose to introduce legislation compelling British vessels sailing from British ports to engage any specified proportion of British subjects; but the Bill now before Parliament provides that no seaman shall be engaged in the United Kingdom before a superintendent who has not sufficient knowledge of English to understand the necessary orders. I understand that the majority of the Chinese on British ships have been engaged at Singapore and at Hong Kong, and therefore the hon. Member has no right to assume that they are not British subjects.

Foreign Pilots in British Waters.

Mr. HOUSTON: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been drawn to the increasing numbers of foreigners engaged in piloting British vessels in British waters; whether, with the view of preventing danger to Great Britain in time of war, he will take measures to prevent pilots of any other nationality than British being engaged in home waters.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) If the hon. Member will refer to the debate on the First Reading of the Merchant Shipping Amendment Bill, he will see that I intimated that I was considering the question whether provision can be made in that Bill for prohibiting or restricting the grant of pilotage certificates to masters or mates who are not British subjects.† The question is one of Treaty obligations, which is now being considered by the law officers.

Income-Tax on Unoccupied Furnished Houses.

Mr. FIELD: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will direct the income-tax authorities in Dublin to give a definite answer to the town clerk of Blackrock as to whether the owners or holders of unoccupied furnished houses are liable for income-tax on the same during the periods they happen to be unoccupied and during which period no profit is derived from the same.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) The liability to income-tax depends on the precise circumstances of each particular case. In the present instance the applicant has been informed that the question is one which must be determined by the Special Commissioners of Taxes, when they are next on circuit in the district, and that in the meantime payment of the duty assessed will not be demanded.

Old-Age Pensions.

Mr. LIDDELL (Down W.): To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will cause inquiries to be made with a view of ascertaining what annual charge would be imposed on the Imperial Exchequer were old-age pensions of 5s. a week granted to all persons over seventy, and whether he will take into consideration the feasibility of conferring old-age pensions upon persons over seventy, thus benefiting a smaller class of the population, though possibly at an earlier date than would be possible were the old-age pensions to be conferred at the age of sixty-five.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) At the last census the number of persons aged seventy or over enumerated was 1,205,069. It would therefore require over £15,500,000 to provide pensions of 5s. a week. I have nothing to add to the statements I have already made on the subject in this House, except that no aspect of the question will be lost sight of.

Olympic Games.

Mr. WATT: To ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, in view of the fact that the French Government has granted 10,000 francs towards the expenses of competitors at the approaching Olympic games, and that the German and United States Governments have also made grants for the same purpose, he will make a similar donation from the British Exchequer for British competitors.

(Answered by Mr. Asquith.) I have received no application for such a donation, and, as it present advised I see no reason for granting any subsidy from public funds.

Rating of Forest Produce in India.

Mr. HART-DAVIES: To ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that, under the orders of the Government of India, No. 22, of

† See (4) Debates, cliv., 291.

19th October, 1894, villagers are entitled to the free use of forest produce from unreserved land for local industrial requirements, but that, under the orders of the Government of Madras, dated 1st December, 1905, the collector of Tanjore is levying from the inhabitants of the Tanjore Delta a rate on account of wood required for agricultural implements and leaves required for manure; and whether, looking to the scarcity now prevailing in those districts, he will cause inquiry to be made into this complaint.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Morley.) The Resolution of the Government of India of 1894, to which the Question refers, does not entitle villagers to the free use of forest products in unreserved districts, but merely says that "every reasonable facility should be afforded to the people concerned for the full and easy satisfaction of their needs; if not free, as may be possible where a system of regular cuttings has been established, then at low and not at competitive rates." As to the order stated to have been issued with respect to the Tanjore forests, I have no information, but I presume that it was duly issued under the Madras Forest Act, which gives a certain discretion to the Madras Government with regard to the regulation of unreserved tracts. As at present advised I see no sufficient reason for ordering an inquiry.

Swine Fever in Ireland.

Mr. FIELD: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will state how many cases of swine fever occurred in each province of Ireland during each of the six months ending 31st January, 1906.

	Ulster.	Munster.	Leinster.	Connaught.

Mr. DILLON: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the amounts which have been advanced year by year for the purposes of the Labourers Acts (Ireland) since 1883.

Fishing on the Stobs Estate.

Sir JOHN JARDINE (Roxburghshire): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware of a notice, published on the 1st March, 1906, by R. L. Hippisley, Colonel, Chief Engineer, Scottish Command, to the effect that the fishing of the Slitrig, and other waters on the War Department's estate of Stobs, is closed to the public from that date, and that all free permits for such fishing are thereby cancelled, and that a limited number of permits will be issued at a small charge; and whether the limitation of the access of the public for fishing heretofore enjoyed is made necessary by military considerations.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) My hon. friend is mistaken in supposing that the public have hitherto had the right of access to the Stobs estate for the purpose of fishing; the fishing has always been preserved. Certain free permits were, however, issued by camp commandants under a misapprehension. It is intended that the preservation of the waters shall be continued.

Donegal Militia.

Mr. CHARLES McVEIGH (Donegal, E.): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he will state how many recruits have the Donegal Militia got for the past three years; and how many recruits did they get for the last three years they were stationed at Lifford.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The recruits taken for the last three calendar years were as follows:—1903, 75; 1904, 66; 1905, 72; for the last three calendar years in which their headquarters were at Lifford the recruits taken were:—1896, 123; 1897, 111; 1898, 154.

QUESTIONS IN THE HOUSE.

Naval Officers' Retired Pay.

Mr. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is aware that an Order in Council, of the 20th November, 1905, under Section 7, confers powers on the Admiralty over the retired pay of officers of an absolute character, rendering the Admiralty the sole judge as to the actions of the retired officer, and empowering them to forfeit his pay without any form of trial other than that of the consideration of his case by the Lords of the Admiralty; and whether the Admiralty will take immediate steps to limit these powers.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON, Dundee): The Order in Council was obtained in order to define in precise form the powers exercised by the Admiralty in the past, and it was drawn up on the advice of the Law Officers of the Crown. The Answer to the last part of the Question is in the negative.

*CAPTAIN HERVEY (Bury St. Edmunds) asked if the word "misconduct" as used in the Order could be construed by the Admiralty as an offence——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member must give notice.

Foreign Steam Trawlers in the English Channel—Plymouth and Brixham Fishermen's Losses.

MR. LAYLAND-BARRATT (Devonshire, Torquay): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the attention of the Admiralty has been drawn to the damage lately caused by foreign steam trawlers in the English Channel to the fishing gear of the Brixham trawling vessels "Salem," "Iris," and "I'll Try," and to the effect the repeated cases of such damage are having on the fishing industry; and whether the Admiralty will consider the advisability of placing a gunboat or other suitable vessel on patrol duty on the fishing grounds, in order to give security to the industry and to prevent a recurrence of such cases.

MR. DOBSON (Plymouth): May I also ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the fact that owners of eight fishing smacks from Plymouth have had nearly 300 of their nets either destroyed or seriously injured by foreign steam trawlers; and whether he will consider the advisability of placing a gunboat on patrol duty on the fishing grounds, in order to give security to the industry and to prevent a recurrence of such cases.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: No report of the circumstances stated has so far been received in the office, but directions have been given for the area to be patrolled by a coast guard cruiser.

Seamens Cap Ribbons.

MR. BELLAIRS: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the frequency with which seamen and stokers are moved from ship to ship, so entailing on them the expense of purchasing new cap ribbons; and whether the Admiralty will in future issue two cap ribbons free of charge.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The matter is at present under consideration.

Naval Manœuvres—Insurance Scheme.

LORD TURNOUR (Sussex, Horsham), (on behalf of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether His Majesty's Government are taking out a policy of £10,000,000 to cover the possible risk to private property owing to the approaching naval manœuvres; and whether any, and, if so, what arrangement is or will be made to provide compensation in the case of injuries to persons and loss of life which may accompany the contemplated loss of property.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The Admiralty have agreed to indemnify the owners of ships co operating in the manœuvres against losses arising from such co-operation, including injuries to person as well as property. The Admiralty have in turn insured themselves against the liability so undertaken by them. The sum of £10,000,000 mentioned in the Question is the estimated value of the ships, including cargo, expected to co operate. The agreements are still under consideration by the Admiralty legal advisers and an advisory Committee representing the other interests involved.

In answer to Mr. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton) and others, Mr. EDMUND ROBERTSON repeated that the negotiations were still going on, and nothing definite had been completed.

Tristan da Cunha.

MR. ASHLEY (Lancashire, Blackpool): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether in view of the fact that January, 1904, was the last occasion on which one of His Majesty's ships sailed with mails and parcels from Cape Town to Tristan da Cunha, he will favourably consider the petition, addressed to the Government of Cape Colony by the relations of these islanders living in that colony, praying that the custom of despatching a war ship annually from Simon's Bay to that island may be revived.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The Admiralty have no knowledge of any such petition.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The hon. Gentleman had better communicate with the Foreign Office.

Discharge of Pembroke Dockyard Workmen.

MR. GIBBS (Bristol, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether the Government propose further to reduce the number of men employed in the Pembroke dockyard.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: It will be necessary to discharge 200 men from Pembroke dockyard, beginning from the 1st April.

Tibetan Indemnity.

SIR H. COTTON (Nottingham, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether the final arrangement come to between the Government of India and the Tibetan authorities in September, 1904, was that the Tibetan Government should pay to the Government of India an indemnity of Rs. 25,00,000 payable by annual instalments of Rs. 1,00,00, the first instalment being payable on January 1st, 1906; whether this instalment has been paid; and, if not, whether it is proposed to allow payment to lapse or to take any measures to enforce payment.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. JOHN MORLEY, Montrose Burghs): The indemnity payable by Tibet is as stated. The first instalment of one lakh became due on January 1st last. Communications as to the payment are now proceeding between the Government of India and a Tibetan official who has been instructed by the Lhasa Government to arrange for the payment.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) asked whether the House was to understand that the Tibetan Government had to pay an indemnity of Rs. 10,000,000 rupees a year for being invaded.

SIR H. COTTON: Are we to understand that no part of the indemnity has been paid?

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Proceedings are going on, as I have said, at Calcutta, between the officials of the Government of India and the Tibetan Government.

MR. J. WARD (Stoke-on-Trent): The last part of the Question is the most important. Is it proposed to use any force to compel payment if the Tibetan Government refuses to pay?

MR. JOHN MORLEY: That Question the Government will consider when occasion arises.

The Chumbi Valley.

SIR H. COTTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India what is the character of the temporary occupation of the Chumbi Valley in Tibet by the British Government, the name of and powers exercised by the civil officer who is in responsible charge of the valley on behalf of the Government, the strength of the British and Indian garrisons stationed in this territory, and the estimated annual cost of the occupation.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Our temporary occupation of the Chumbi Valley is based on a system of allowing the people to manage their affairs through their headmen with a right of appeal in certain cases against their headmen to the assistant political agent. After discussion with the local headmen, proposals to raise a revenue estimated at Rs. 4,075 per annum on the lines of the existing system of taxation have been sanctioned by the Government of India. This is less than the amount hitherto raised. The civil officer in responsible charge of the valley is Mr. J. C. White, political officer in Sikkim, with an assistant stationed in the Chumbi Valley. The strength of the troops is two and a half companies of Native Infantry (about 200 men). I have no separate figures of cost. But the total annual cost of the occupation of the Chumbi and of the trade agencies at Gyangtse and Gartok, including military expenditure is Rs. 3,85,600.

SIR H. COTTON: Looking to the fact that the occupation of the valley was to last for three years only, I should like to know whether the omission to pay the indemnity will protract that occupation.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: We must wait, and see whether the indemnity is or is not paid.

Tibetan Trade Marts.

SIR H. COTTON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether, in accordance with the terms of the Convention of 1904 between Great Britain and Tibet, trade marts have been opened out at Gyantze, Gartok, and Yatung; whether British agents have been appointed at these marts; and, if so, what are their names and official rank, the strength of the escort, if any, which has been provided for each place, and the estimated annual cost of maintaining those agencies.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: Trade marts have been opened at Gyangtse and Gartok under the terms of the Convention of 1904. The mart at Gyangtse has taken the place of that at Yatung, at which no trade agent is stationed. Captain O'Connor has been appointed trade agent at Gyangtse and Thakeer Jai Chand at Gartok. There is no escort at Gartok. The escort at Gyangtse consists of seventy-five native infantry.

Indian Military Administration.

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that the Committee appointed last year to advise His Majesty's Government on the question of Indian military administration stated in their Report that they invited opinions from Lord Cromer, Lord Elgin, Sir H. Brackenbury, Sir E. H. Collen, and others, and whether he is now aware that these opinions were obtained for the use of the Committee, and not privately by Mr. Brodrick for his own information; whether, as these opinions were obtained by the Committee for a public purpose, and were twice referred to by them in their Report, which has been laid before Parliament, he will, in accordance with ordinary usage, present them to Parliament also; whether any opinions from the Viceroy or the Commander-in-Chief were laid before the Committee other than those which have already appeared in the Blue-book; and, if so, whether he will also present them to Parliament.

MR. JOHN MORLEY: I am aware of the statement in the Report, but I have reason to believe that the Answer which I gave on the 2nd inst. represents accurately what took place.† It is certain that such opinions as were given in writing were regarded by my predecessor as private and confidential documents; for, as I have already stated, he left no copies of them at the India Office. This being so, I am of course unable to present them to Parliament. I am not aware of any opinions that were laid before the Committee other than those which appeared in the Blue-book.

Colonial Immigration Bills.

MR. HUGH LAW (Donegal, W.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can state the number of Bills passed by colonial legislatures having reference to immigration from which the Royal Assent was withheld during the ten years from 1885–95, and from 1895–1905 respectively.

THE UNDER-SECRETARY FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. CHURCHILL, Manchester, N.W.): The only Bills relating to immigration passed by colonial legislatures to which the Royal Assent was refused between 1885 and 1905 are the four mentioned in the House of Commons Return No. 362 of 1901. Immigration Acts of the Province of British Columbia have been disallowed by the Governor-General of Canada at our request, but the Question of my hon. friend would scarcely apply to these; for the provincial legislation of Canada is not subject to Royal Assent, but is subject to disallowance by the Governor-General.

Cable Communication with the West Indies.

MR. MITCHELL-THOMSON (Lanarkshire, N.W.): I beg to ask the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the frequent interruptions of cable communication in the West Indies owing largely to submarine volcanic disturbances; and whether, in these circumstances, His Majesty's Government will consider the advisability of extending the system of wireless telegraphy now in use between Trinidad and Tobago to others of the islands also.

MR. CHURCHILL: The Answer to the first part of the hon. Member's Question is in the affirmative. The Secretary of State is aware of the desirability of improving telegraphic communication in the British West Indies; and in considering this Question he will certainly not lose sight of the possibilities of wireless telegraphy.

MR. LAYLAND-BARRATT (Devonshire, Torquay): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the losses of fishing gear sustained by the owners of the Brixham trawling vessels "Salem," "Iris," and "I'll Try," through the action of foreign steam trawlers in the English Channel, and to the effect the repeated cases of such damage are having on the fishing industry; and whether he will make representations to the foreign Governments concerned, with a view to securing compensation for such losses, and preventing their recurrence in the future.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir EDWARD GREY, Northumberland, Berwick): Representations have been made with regard to the "Salem," and the same course will be taken with regard to the "I'll Try." No action is possible in the case of the "Iris," unless the offending vessel can be identified.

MR. MALLET (Plymouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether his attention has been called to the losses sustained by Plymouth fishermen, owing to the recent action of foreign steam trawlers in the English Channel, and whether he will make representations to the foreign Governments concerned, with a view to securing compensation, and to preventing such losses in future.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The Answer I gave to the hon. Member for the Torquay Division is also a reply to this Question.†

Russian Duties on Indian and Ceylon Teas.

SIR SEYMOUR KING: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that Indian and Ceylon tea, shipped to Russian European ports, either direct or via United Kingdom, is subject to a differential duty of one penny per pound as against tea produced by other countries; and whether, seeing that recent telegrams give ground for supposing that the Russian Government contemplate still further imposts on British-grown tea, and that orders for Indian and Ceylon tea have consequently been held back, pending further information on the subject, he will say whether any remonstrances have been addressed to the Russian Government; and whether His Majesty's Government will use every effort to prevent this industry being thus handicapped in Russian markets.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The Answer to the first Question is in the affirmative. I have no reason to suppose that the duty will be further increased. It is not proposed to make further representations to the Russian Government, as those made a few months ago led to no result.

SIR SEYMOUR KING: Will the Government consider the advisability of retaliating upon Russian oil?

SIR EDWARD GREY: These particular duties which the Russian Government have imposed are by way of retaliation for the prohibition of Russian sugar under the Sugar Convention. I do not think it will be desirable to carry the game of retaliation any further.

† See preceding Question and Answer.

Turkey and the Sinai Peninsula.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Turkish garrisons have been reinforced at points near the Sinai Peninsula, now the subject of negotiations between the Egyptian Government and the Sublime Porte; and, if so, do His Majesty's Government propose to take any action in the matter.

SIR EDWARD GREY: His Majesty's Government have no information as to the despatch of reinforcements to the posts now occupied by Turkish troops in the Sinai Peninsula. According to the latest information in their possession there are three battalions at Akaba.

British Vice-Consuls on the Congo.

MR. J. R. MACDONALD (Leicester): On behalf of the hon. Member for the Elland Division of Yorkshire I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Consul Nightingale has now returned to his post on the Lower Congo; whether the British vice-consuls on the Upper Congo have yet started on the inland tour decided upon by His Majesty's Government; and whether their itinerary will include an extensive visit to the portion of the Congo territories known as the Domaine de la Couronne.

SIR EDWARD GREY: Consul Nightingale arrived at his post on the 19th ultimo. We are expecting to receive very shortly estimates of the cost of the tours which the two vice-consuls are to make in the interior. It is proposed that the Domaine de la Couronne shall be one of the districts visited.

SIR GILBERT PARKER (Gravesend): Are we to understand there are only two vice-consuls on the Congo?

SIR EDWARD GREY: Oh, no. I am not sure what the total number is, but I will ascertain if the hon. Member wishes.

Macedonian Budget.

MR. CHARLES ROBERTS (Lincoln): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any Budget has been prepared by the Commission of Financial Control for Macedonia; and, if so, what sums have been allotted to the departments of police, works, justice and civil administration.

SIR EDWARD GREY: The Budgets of the three vilayets of Salonica, Monastir, and Kossovo have been settled by the International Financial Commission, and forwarded to the Sublime Porte. The sum which it is proposed to allot for civil administration is £768,697. This includes £26,803 for the department of police and £76,691 for the department of justice. A sum of £77,851 is provided for public works.

Inland Revenue Abatements.

SIR WILLIAM BULL (Hammersmith): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer why the Board of Inland Revenue have made new regulations, which deprive persons from the relief to which they are statutorily entitled under Section 8 of 61 and 62 Vic., c. 10, except under such conditions as they admit are practically impossible to be complied with.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. ASQUITH, Fifeshire, E.): The regulations are designed merely for the purpose of obtaining satisfactory proof of a claimant's title to relief. They only operate to deprive a claimant of relief when he cannot produce such proof, and in the view of the Department they can be complied with.

SIR WILLIAM BULL: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether claimants entitled to relief from Income Tax, under 61 and 62 Vic., c. 10, Part 3, s. 8, can be deprived of any part of the repayment to which they are entitled, on the ground that some of their dividends are upon stocks and shares which are not exclusively inscribed or registered in their own name.

MR. ASQUITH: No. But they must produce satisfactory evidence of their beneficial interest in such stocks and shares.

SIR WILLIAM BULL: I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, when the Board of Inland Revenue require documentary legal evidence of a claimant being entitled to a certain proportion of an income, whether inscribed or registered in his own name or in the names of others, they will supply him with a form to be executed in Great Britain before a magistrate, justice of the peace, or a commissioner for oaths, or abroad before the British consul, justice of the peace, or a notary public, that the claimant may know their requirements.

Mr. ASQUITH: What the Commissioners of Inland Revenue require in cases of securities registered in names other than that of the claimant is not an instrument in the form of a declaration made for the express purpose of obtaining a repayment of Income Tax, but some documentary evidence which shall establish the fact of beneficial ownership, on the part of the claimant, in stocks or shares standing in some other person's name. What such documentary evidence should be must depend upon the particular circumstances of each case, and cannot well be prescribed beforehand or be embodied in a form.

Taxation on Sport.

Mr. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer if, in view of the fact that he is not prepared to impose a special tax on deer forests, salmon fishings, and grouse moors, he will consider the expediency of imposing a special tax on other objects of sumptuary expenditure, such as yachts and motor cars, other than those used for professional or business purposes.

Mr. ASQUITH: The question of widening the range of taxation upon luxuries will have my serious consideration; but I cannot with advantage deal with specific proposals, except in connection with the financial system of the country as a whole in the annual Budget statement.

Mr. WEIR hoped the right hon. Gentleman would take an early opportunity of considering the matter, as Scotland was much in need of money for public purposes.

Abstractor Clerks in the Customs.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the scale of overtime payments for abstractor clerks was calculated on the maximum salary of £150; and in view of the fact that a number of these clerks in the Customs Statistical Office are in receipt of a salary and allowance rising to £180, for checking the work of other clerks who are engaged upon the duties of compiling and preparing for publication the Board of Trade Returns of Imports and Exports, whether he will amend the scale of overtime payment in such a manner that the rate per hour shall not be less than that earned during the day.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. McKenna, Monmouthshire, N.): With regard to the first part of the Question I have nothing to add to the Answer which I gave the hon. Member on the 1st instant.† It is a fact that the checking allowances are not taken account of in fixing the rate of overtime payment. These allowances are intended to cover all work, whether in or out of official hours, for which they are given, and do not form an integral part of the rate of salary, on which a rate of overtime payment can be equitably calculated.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY: Arising out of that, am I to understand that overtime pay is less than scale pay earned day by day?

Mr. McKENNA: These are extra allowances and not overtime pay.

Mr. CLAUDE HAY: Is it not quite clear that overtime is paid for at a lower rate than ordinary duty?

Mr. McKENNA: No, Sir, it is not quite clear.

Agricultural Holdings on Crown Lands.

Mr. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury how many agricultural holdings there are on Crown lands in England (excluding Wales) of the following size respectively: over three and up to ten acres, over ten and up to twenty acres, over twenty and up to thirty acres, over thirty and up to forty acres, and over forty and up to fifty acres.

---

† See (4) Debates, clii., 1315 6.

Over 3 and up to	10 acres	...	147
„ 40 „	50 „	...	9

Army and Navy Meat Contracts.

MR. HAROLD COX (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any instructions were issued by the late Government that the supplies of meat to the Army and Navy should be drawn as far as possible from colonial scources; if so, whether these instructions have resulted in preventing British subjects who deal in foreign meat from tendering on equal terms with other British subjects who deal in colonial meat; and whether any additional burden has, in consequence, been placed upon the taxpayers of the United Kingdom.

MR. McKENNA: The Treasury has no information on this subject. I would suggest to my hon. friend that he should address his inquiry to the Admiralty and War Office respectively.

Prosecution of Passive Resisters.

MR. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many prosecutions have there been during the last three years in England and Wales, including London, for resistance to the Education Acts, or to any of them, or to their administration; in how many of those cases has sentence of imprisonment been pronounced; and in how many of those cases has the sentence been quashed or remitted, the term shortened, the rigour of imprisonment modified, or other relief been given in recognition of popular principle, the absence of moral criminality, or on any other than legal grounds.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): I am not aware of any prosecutions having been instituted in consequence of resistance to the Education Acts. There have of course been many cases of refusal to pay the rates levied for the maintenance of denominational schools, but such refusal is not a criminal offence. The payment of the rates is enforced by civil process, and when in default of distress the defendant is imprisoned he is imprisoned as a debtor. The Executive Government has no power to relieve any person from the liability to pay rates, nor to interfere with the legal process whereby that liability is enforced.

Metropolitan Police Fund.

DR. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the fact that the balance of the Metropolitan Police Fund now stands at £711,155 14s. 1d.; whether that, notwithstanding this accumulated balance, the maximum rate of 5d. on the local authorities is still levied; and whether he will consider the advisableness of reducing the amount of the rate, having regard to the increased rateable value of London in the new quinquennial valuation now coming in force.

MR. GLADSTONE: The amount mentioned represents the balance on the 31st March, 1905, as stated in the accounts presented to Parliament; but the overdrawn balance of the Police Pension Fund has to be deducted from it, leaving a net balance of £533,196 0s. 2d. The balance of the Police Fund at the close of the financial year is always large, owing to the fact that during the last few days of March heavy payments are made from the Local Taxation Account, as well as by various Government Departments, for the service of the police. The amount so received during the last ten days of March, 1905, was £273,887. But at other periods of the year it falls so low as to be at times insufficient to meet the actual needs of the service: for instance, taking the current financial year, pending the receipt of the sum due on the January rate warrants the balance had disappeared altogether, and it was necessary to borrow money to meet the pay of the force. I will give the whole matter my careful consideration before the next rate warrants are issued: but having regard to the constantly increasing demands for augmentations of the force, I am afraid I can hold out no hope of a reduction in the amount of the police rate.

Aliens on Strike—Case of Hyam Goldstein.

Mr. J. M. ROBERTSON (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of Hyam Goldstein, a master, charged (with two others) at the Thames Police Court, on 2nd March, with committing an assault in a strike; whether his attention has been called to the remarks of the officiating magistrate, Mr. Dickinson, in refusing bail, and to the fact that, after Goldstein had been kept in custody for a week, he was discharged by the same magistrate, on 9th March, with the admission that there was a doubt whether he committed the assault; and whether he proposes to take any action in the matter.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I have no authority to interfere with the discretion used by a magistrate in deciding when bail may be allowed. When the hearing of a charge is adjourned under Section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, the statute expressly gives the Court a discretion in this matter, and having made careful inquiry into the facts of this particular case, I see no reason to doubt that the discretion was wisely exercised.

Railway Servants—Hours of Duty.

Mr. WARDLE (Stockport): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he intends to introduce any legislation providing for a reform of the Railway Hours Act, 1893; and whether, in view of the hours still being worked on railways, he will consider the advisability of having each case reported where a man is employed for over twelve hours at any one time, as obtains in France.

The PRESIDENT of the BOARD of TRADE (Mr. Lloyd-George, Carnarvon Boroughs): I am advised that the provisions of the Act of 1893 are sufficient for the purpose, and that the Act has been of great value in bringing about a reduction in the hours of labour, but if the hon. Member is prepared to lay before me his suggestions for an amendment of the law, I shall be happy to consider them. I shall be quite ready to move for periodical Returns which will bring out the information desired by my hon. friend, but, as at present advised, I cannot adopt the suggestion made in the Question. If he will read the Report of the Select Committee of 1892, he will find that that proposal was made but was not adopted by the Committee.

Foreign Tariffs.

Mr. MOND (Chester): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state what tariffs, if any, of foreign countries are framed on the principle of differentiating between raw materials and manufactured goods.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: I cannot attempt, in Answer to a Question, to lay down the principles which have been followed by foreign Governments in framing their customs tariffs.

Railway Superannuation Funds.

Mr. WARDLE: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the deficit disclosed in connection with the superannuation funds belonging to certain railway companies, established under statutory powers granted by this House, he will consider the advisability of appointing a Select Committee to inquire into the scope, management, and present position of all such funds.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: I have no jurisdiction with regard to these superannuation funds. I gather that they are established under special clauses inserted in Private Bills, and I shall be happy to discuss with the authorities of this House whether any useful purpose would be served by the appointment of a Committee.

Trade Disputes.

Mr. CLYNES (Manchester, N.E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that many disputes, causing stoppage of work, occur because of the refusal of the employers or their agents to meet the appointed representatives of the workmen; and whether he can present to the House any record showing the number and extent of such disputes during recent years.

Mr. LLOYD-GEORGE: I am aware that the refusal of one or other of the parties to trade disputes to meet the representatives of the other party has sometimes tended to cause and more frequently to prolong the stoppage of work. The records of trade disputes published by the Board of Trade only take into account the principal and direct causes of the disputes, and not the contributory causes or incidental circumstances, and the cases in which a refusal of the parties to meet has figured as the principal cause of the dispute have been comparatively rare.

Industrial Census.

MR. LONSDALE (Armagh, Mid.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is in contemplation to take a compulsory industrial census of the United Kingdom, for the purpose of obtaining statistics of the home trade of the country and the freight earnings of the British mercantile marine; and, if so, when the Government intend to ask for legislative sanction to this proposal.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: The matter is under consideration, but I am not at present able to add anything to my reply to the hon. Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne on the 1st instant. †

Dearne Valley Railway Accident.

MR. J. WARD (Stoke-on-Trent): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he proposes to hold an inquiry, under The Notice of Accidents Act, 1894, into the cause and circumstances of the accident which recently occurred on the Dearne Valley Railway now in course of construction at Laversall, near Doncaster, by which three men were killed and four others seriously injured.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I shall be very glad if my hon. friend will see me some time this afternoon as to what he wishes the Board of Trade to do in this matter.

Mercantile Seamen's Wage Advances.

MR. L. HASLAM (Monmouth Boroughs): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will consider the advisability of taking steps, by legislation or otherwise, so that merchant seamen shall have the right to claim that a portion of their wages, while they are away on voyage, shall be paid to persons dependent upon them for support, to banks, to trades unions, or similar institutions, as they may appoint.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: A seaman can already (under Section 141 (2) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894) allot half of his wages to a near relative or to a savings bank. I will consider whether it is desirable to extend the provisions of this section to trade unions, or similar institutions as the seaman may appoint.

House of Commons Post Office.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster-General if a larger and more convenient Post Office can be arranged for in the House of Commons' Lobby.

THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL (Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON, Tower Hamlets, Poplar): As I stated yesterday in reply to the hon. Members for the West Riding of Yorkshire and the West Derby Division of Liverpool,‡ I have arranged for certain measures to be taken under which the facilities afforded hon. Members in the transaction of Post Office business in the House will be improved.

Grants-in-Aid for Agricultural Land

MR. STARKEY (Nottinghamshire, Newark): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, inasmuch as the annual grant received by some unions is not now sufficient to cover the relief intended to be granted to agricultural land under The Agricultural Rates Act, 1896, he will take steps to have that Act so amended as to again ascertain the amount which should be paid to the local taxation account for distribution amongst each spending authority.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. JOHN BURNS, Battersea): As I stated on the 5th instant, in reply to a Question by the noble Viscount the Member for the Thirsk and Malton Division,§ I could not undertake to bring in a Bill for the purpose suggested.

Local Taxation Grants.

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been drawn to the present distribution of the grant on account of indoor poor under Section 43 (1 b) of the Local Government Act, 1888, which is still based upon the average number of indoor poor maintained during the five years ended Lady Day, 1888, and that owing to the variations which have occurred in local pauperism since that date certain unions and parishes suffer an annual loss on the grant, such loss being equal in the case of Poplar to a rate of 1·59d. in the £ on the rateable value of the union, while certain other unions receive a grant considerably in excess of their present pauperism, one parish in the East End receiving a sum of 4·3d. in the £ upon the rateable value more than it is entitled to on its present rate of pauperism; and whether he will bring in a Bill to provide an equitable adjustment of the grant.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I am aware of the basis upon which the grant is made as required by the enactment referred to. The Royal Commission on Local Taxation recommended the abolition of this grant and the substitutisn of another for it. The whole subject of the grant must be considered when the Government deal with the question of Local Taxation, and in the meantime I could not promise to propose legislation with regard to the basis upon which the grant is distributed.

MR. CROOKS: Am I to understand that the question will be dealt with on the Equalisation Bill which the Government are supposed to intend to bring in?

MR. JOHN BURNS: I cannot promise that.

Lambeth Farm Colony.

MR. CLAUDE HAY: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will state the grounds upon which he has refused to allow the Lambeth Board of Guardians to purchase certain lands upon which to establish a farm colony, and for other purposes, in order to relieve the overcrowded state of the workhouse.

MR. JOHN BURNS: The area of the land which was proposed to be purchased is 567 acres. It is situated fifty miles from the parish of Lambeth and the price asked for it was £12,000. In a letter which I caused to be addressed to the guardians on 27th January last, it was pointed out that in addition to certain objections which had been previously indicated (viz., those arising from the size of the farm, and its distance from the parish), no evidence had been produced to show that the guardians had any definite scheme for using the land, or as to the number and classes of the persons to be sent there, and the means for classifying them according to sex, age, and condition. It was also pointed out that it would ultimately be necessary to provide extensive accommodation, including administrative buildings, and the appointment of an adequate staff of officers and servants, and that the history of experiments similar to that contemplated did not appear to warrant the assumption that the proposal would be likely to be attended with such a measure of success as would justify the large expenditure involved. It was added that the guardians would have no power to detain on the farm men who, accustomed to a town life, would probably frequently avail themselves of their right to take their discharge, and return to their old surroundings. It was for these reasons that it appeared to me that the proposal was one which I could not properly entertain.

MR. KEIR HARDIE (Merthyr Tydvil): Does the £12,000 represent the cost of the land only, or does it include the cost of establishing the colony?

MR. JOHN BURNS: The land only.

Returns of Local Indebtedness.

MR. G. A. HARDY (Suffolk, Stowmarket): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, in view of the character of the Returns that are periodically issued from Government Departments respecting the debt of local authorities, the Government will consider the desirability of issuing a general intimation to the effect that all future Returns shall differentiate between loans contracted for reproductive and unproductive purposes, or, alternatively, that the value of assets shall in every case be placed against the debt.

Mr. JOHN BURNS: The only Returns periodically issued by the Local Government Board respecting the debt of local authorities are the annual Local Taxation Returns for England and Wales. In these Returns separate particulars are given of the loans contracted for various purposes, including most, if not all, the undertakings which may be regarded as reproductive.

Butter Adulteration.

Mr. EDWARD BARRY (Cork County, S.): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he has seen certain recommendations recently made by Professor Long, with a view of safeguarding the natural purity of butter in Great Britain and Ireland against adulteration with fatty substances from Chigago stock yards, commonly known as margarine; that, with a view of making analytical detection possible, it be made compulsory on manufacturers of margarine to use harmless substances, such as sesame or dehydrated starch, in its manufacture; and that any substance, chemical or preservative, except pure salt, should not be allowed in the manufacture of butter; and whether, seeing that this system of facilitating detection already prevails in Germany, Belgium, and other European countries, steps will be taken to carry Mr. Long's recommendations into effect.

Sir EDWARD STRACHEY: The suggestions made by Professor Long, to which the attention of my noble friend has been directed, will no doubt be considered by the Select Committee on the Butter Trade which has recently been appointed.

Suggested Legislation against Butter Adulteration.

Mr. EDWARD BARRY: I beg further to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether, in view of the fact that the production of a warranty as to the purity of butter, obtained by the vendor from the previous dealer, is held to be sufficient guarantee of the good faith of the vendor, and that the liability to a penalty is sometimes thus shifted from one dealer to another, until it becomes almost impossible to trace the original offender, steps will immediately be taken, in the interests of pure butter making, to so alter the law as to facilitate the detection of fraudulent practices.

Sir EDWARD STRACHEY: I am afraid I cannot undertake to initiate legislation on this subject pending the Report of the Select Committee on the Butter Trade.

Precautions against Cattle Disease.

Mr. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire): I beg to ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he is aware that the United States of America, while admitting store cattle from Canada, have put restrictions on the importation of hay and straw as liable to carry disease; and whether the Board of Agriculture intends for the safety of our flocks and herds to restrict the importation of hay and straw.

Sir EDWARD STRACHEY: So far as we are aware, there are no restrictions on the importation of hay and straw from Canada into the United States, but hay and straw from European countries are required to be disinfected before importation is allowed. The desirability of adopting some similar measure in this country has frequently been considered, but the evidence of actual danger is not clear, and the inconvenience to the trades concerned would be out of all proportion to the risk involved. There is, of course, power to seize, detain, or destroy hay or straw in specific cases where there is reason to believe that disease might be introduced.

Denominational Teaching in Public Elementary Schools.

*Mr. MASSIE (Wiltshire, Cricklade): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Education whether he is aware of the fact that endeavours are being made throughout the country to induce the parents of children attending public elementary schools to sign a petition to Parliament in favour of the continuance of specific denominational teaching, on the ground, amongst others, that it is the intention of the present Government to abolish religious teaching altogether in the schools; whether he is aware that some pressure is being put upon elementary teachers to secure parental signatures to this petition; if so, whether any teacher who declines so to canvass the parents will have the support of the Board of Education.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF EDUCATION (Mr. BIRRELL, Bristol, N.): I have received a large number of petitions, and I believe others are being prepared, asking that in any Amendment of the Education Act care may be taken to secure to their children the right to be taught the Christian religion as set out in the Church Catechism by Christian masters and mistresses and other teachers in regard to whom we may have some real assurance that they believe what they teach. No teacher has complained to the Board of such pressure as the Question suggests. Any teacher who declined to canvass parents would receive the Board's support, but the powers of the Board in this matter are very limited, and an aggrieved teacher would probably have a better chance of redress at the hands of the local authority.

The Mall Improvement.

MR. CLAUDE HAY: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if he will state what price was paid by the Government in 1883–5 for the four houses north of Messrs. Drummonds' Bank necessary for the further widening of the opening of the Mall into Charing Cross; and what is the estimated value of the freeholds to-day.

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. HARCOURT, Lancashire, Rossendale): The Answer to the first Question is £33,529. It would not be to the public interest to reply to the second Question, even if I knew the Answer, which I do not.

Clifford's Inn.

*MR. LEHMANN (Leicestershire, Market Harborough): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney-General what is the present position of the scheme for dealing with the funds arising out of the sale of Clifford's Inn; and what share of the said funds will be devoted to providing legal education in universities and institutions in London or the provinces.

THE ATTORNEY-GENERAL (Sir JOHN WALTON, Leeds, S.) said that a deadlock occurred in connection with the scheme, owing to the objection taken by two of the Inns of Court. An amended scheme was framed with a view to dealing with the matter for immediate purposes. By that scheme half of the revenue of the consolidated fund would be paid to the Council of Legal Education and the other half to the Incorporated Law Society for the purpose of making further provision for the education of law students. In that form the scheme was now in temporary operation, and he trusted that before long some effort would be successfully made to effect a much wider provision which would result in creating a school of law, in which members of both professions might receive their education.

Stornoway Light Railway.

MR. WEIR: I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if, in view of the fact that the Lewis District Committee are unable to comply with the Treasury conditions for the construction of a light railway between Carloway and Stornoway, and on the 14th instant passed a Resolution urging that the Carloway new road should be completed and rendered available for a motor car service, he will state the approximate cost of completing this road; and whether the Government propose to put the work in hand at an early date.

THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. SINCLAIR, Forfarshire): I have received a copy of the Resolution referred to. The cost of completing the road was stated in 1902 to be not less than £10,000, but this sum might be quite insufficient if the road were to be rendered available for a service of motor waggons. There are no funds now available for the purpose.

Scottish Fishery Board.

MR. AINSWORTH (Argyll): I beg to ask the Secretary for Scotland if he will consider the advisability of remodelling the Fishery Board for Scotland, by putting it on the same footing as the Local Government Board for Scotland, with the Secretary for Scotland as president, and a chairman and legal and scientific members, with salaries, responsible to himself and to Parliament.

MR. SINCLAIR: No, Sir, the Government have under their observation the working of the Fishery Board, and if any changes in the system seem necessary, they will be carefully considered.

Irish Collectors of Income-Tax.

MR. MEEHAN (Queen's County, Leix): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what provision, if any, has been made to compensate collectors of income-tax, under Schedule A, in Ireland, for loss of poundage fees consequent on the sale of estates under The Land Act, 1903; (2) if he is aware that poundage fees for 1903 and 1904 are yet unpaid; (3) whether, in view of the promise made by the Comptroller of Inland Revenue to make good the diminution of poundage fees between the former and present collections, he will say how many claims were sent in; (4) if payments have yet been made; (5) if not, when will payments be made; (6) if he is aware that a clause was formerly inserted in the terms of appointment, providing that as the tax had been decreased, or increased, the rate of poundage named was computed to yield about the same remuneration as the previous year, and will he explain why this clause has been omitted from term of appointment for 1905 and 1906; and (7) whether he can say if the work of collection has been increased and the poundage reduced, and (8) if steps will be taken to bring up the salary to the amount it formerly was, and collectors be paid fair wages for the work they perform.

MR. McKENNA: (1) No general regulation has been made on the subject, but the Board of Inland Revenue have undertaken to consider cases of hardship on their merits; (2) poundage fees for 1903–4 have all been paid, and also those for 1904–5 with a few exceptions, where the accounts have not yet been finally closed; (3) no promise, other than that indicated above, has been made. In accordance with it thirty-two claims have been received in respect of the two years, of which twenty have been granted, three have been refused on the ground that the Land Act has made no material change in the collector's duties, and nine are still under consideration; (4) payment of the twenty claims admitted has been made; (5) claims cannot be paid until they are admitted; (6) the clause in question is only applicable in years in which a change is made in the rate of the income-tax; (7) the tendency of the sale of estates is to diminish the amount of tax to be collected, and therefore the amount of work in collecting. Poundage has certainly not been reduced, except when the rate of income-tax has been increased; (8) every endeavour will be used to make wages appropriate to the work performed, but until the effect of the Land Purchase Act on the business of the collectors has been more fully developed, it is not possible to fix a new scale of remuneration that will be appropriate to the new conditions that are in course of being established.

South African Committee of Inquiry.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he is yet in a position to announce the names of the Committee of Inquiry which is to proceed to South Africa, or the terms of the reference for its guidance.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, Stirling Burghs): My hon. friend the Member for South Huntingdon has also given me private notice of a similar Question. The Members of the Committee, which will proceed as early as possible to South Africa, are, Sir West Ridgeway, who will be Chairman; Lord Sandhurst, Sir Francis Hopwood, and Colonel Johnston, R.E. The last named member is already in South Africa. The terms of reference will be best gathered from a letter addressed by the Secretary of State for the Colonies to the Chairman which I will lay on the Table to-day.

Trinity College, Dublin.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will give the Return asked for in the Order Paper this day relating to the revenues and method of government and administration of Trinity College, Dublin.†

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I do not see any objection whatever in principle to accepting the hon. Gentleman's suggestion, but having regard to the fact that a Commission is shortly to be appointed to go into the whole question, and that all the facts and figures for which the hon. Gentleman asks will no doubt be brought out in the course of the inquiries, I think the authorities of Trinity College should not be put to the trouble of obtaining the material asked for and that there is really nothing to be gained by providing such a Return.

Purposes of the British Army.

MR. ARTHUR LEE (Hampshire, Fareham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether he will now consider the advisability of carrying into effect the suggestion which he made to the late Government, on May 11th,‡ 1905, to the effect that an official Memorandum should be issued stating for what purposes the British Army is maintained, and what is the number of men required for the defence of the country and for its oversea obligations.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I cannot trace any demand made by myself for an official Memorandum on this subject, though I did ask for information. I interpret the hon. Member's Question, therefore, as inviting me to give that information as to the purposes for which the British Army is maintained and the number of men required. The hon. Member and his friends were in power for ten years and they had all the advantage of a succession of War Ministers with fresh ideas and relays of energy. The Committee of Imperial Defence has also been in existence under the guidance of the late Prime Minister for two or three years. But the late Government appear to have been unable to arrive at and state publicly a conclusion on this subject. The hon. member now expects me after a few weeks of office largely occupied by a general election, and after attending four or five meetings of the Committee of Imperial Defence, to do what the late Government failed to do with all their advantages of both time and talent. I think the hon. member must have patience for a little longer.

MR. ARTHUR LEE: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will consider the advisability of endeavouring to give this information to the House before it is called upon to discuss the reductions in the Army which were foreshadowed in his speech during the recent Army debate and were not contemplated by the late Government?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The hon. Gentleman may be sure that no time will be lost in the matter.

Ministers' Salaries.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will consider the propriety of making an arrangement, commencing with the financial year 1906–7, by which substantial reductions may be effected in the salaries of Secretaries of State, Under-Secretaries, and other members of the Government, with a view to effect such economies in the public service as may help to provide sufficient funds for carrying into effect the declared views of the House of Commons.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am not of opinion that the officials in question are overpaid for the duties they discharge.

MR. CLAUDE HAY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will take the necessary measures to ensure that the salary of the President of the Board of Trade shall in future be fixed at £5,000 a year, and the salary of the President of the Local Government Board raised to £3,000, the salary of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Board of Trade and of the Local Government Board to be fixed at £1,500 a year, and the salary of the Permanent Secretary of the Board of Trade and of the Local Government Board at £2,000 a year, in accordance with the recommendations of the Committee appointed by Treasury Minute, dated July 18th, 1903, so that the status and pay of the staffs of these Departments may be proportionately increased.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I believe there have been proposals for a re-adjustment of salaries, and the late Government announced a Bill for that purpose in the King's Speech last year; but the matter went no further. I am not prepared to promise any legislation on the subject during the present session.

MR. CROOKS: Was the proposal bracketed with the redistribution scheme?

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It has gone the same way.

Ministers and Company Directorships.

MR. CLAUDE HAY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Secretary to the Board of Education is a director of the Tower Tea Company, Limited; whether the Secretary to the Board of Trade is a director of the International Tea Company's Stores, Limited; whether the Paymaster-General is the chairman of, or a director of, Sir Joseph Causton & Sons, Limited; whether these companies are private companies; and whether he has satisfied himself that these companies have not tendered for the supply of goods to any department of the public service.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I am imformed that information as to the directors of companies may be obtained at Somerset House on payment of the very moderate fee of a shilling per company. Another source of information is a volume entitled "The Directory of Directors," for which I am afraid I cannot with the best will in the world claim to be an adequate substitute. However, as I am anxious to save the hon. Gentleman any unnecessary trouble and expense I may tell him at once that my hon. friend the Secretary to the Board of Education is not a director of the Tower Tea Company, that my hon. friend the Under-Secretary to the Board of Trade is not a director of the International Tea Company's Stores. The company of which my right hon. friend the Paymaster-General is a director is a private family company. Whether the companies named in the Question have tendered for public contracts I do not know, but no doubt the hon. Gentleman can ascertain if he puts himself into communication with the various departments.

MR. CLAUDE HAY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will define the private companies of which he deems it proper that Ministers of the Crown should hold directorships.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: It is impossible to give a definition in precise terms. What is meant is that class of company in which the interest of the Minister, if a director, is substantially the same as the interest of a partner in a business firm.

The Artisans' Dwellings Company.

MR. ASHLEY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will explain why the Under-Secretary of State for War has been allowed to remain a director of the Artisans', Labourers', and General Dwellings Company, Limited, a company which has paid, from 1879 to 1904, dividends of 5 per cent. per annum to its shareholders, and whose ordinary stock stands at 111.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I understand that the Artisans' Company is not an ordinary commercial company. It devotes the whole of its profits after paying 5 per cent. to its shareholders to keeping down the rents for the working classes who are its tenants. It, therefore, seems to me to be a philanthropic society, but a microscopic investigation has revealed to me the fact that a director does receive a very modest remuneration, and therefore I have advised the noble Lord to resign his directorship.

ALLOTTED DAYS OF SUPPLY.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR (City of London), remarking that some doubt still existed in the minds of a large number of Members whether Monday was to be counted as a day allotted to Supply—a Question on which point had been put by the right hon. Member for West Derbyshire on the previous day†—asked the Speaker for further information. He said the matter was of great importance, because the number of days allotted to Supply was limited under the Standing Order, and by cutting off one day great injury might be done to those whose business it was to criticise the Government. The Standing Order provided that a day occupied by the consideration of Estimates supplementary to those of the preceding session should not be included in the computation of twenty days. He did not, of course, suggest that Monday was occupied by the consideration of the Supplementary Estimate then taken, but when he was responsible for the management of the business of the House he would have thought he had very seriously impaired the probability of this being a counted day if he had permitted anything but the financial business of the year to come under the consideration of the House. He would be glad to know definitely whether Monday was to be a counting day, although business had been done which did not come under that prescribed by the Standing Order. He quite admitted that the matter was a small one in so far as the actual time occupied by the Vote was concerned, for that time was insignificant, but the Speaker's ruling would be of great importance not only as regulating their affairs for this session, but also as regulating the manner in which this rule was to be worked in the future.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am sorry I did not make myself quite clear yesterday. What occurred was that when the business of Supply set down for Monday terminated at 10.30 a number of Reports of Supply were taken, and among them was one relating to the Navy which was a Supplementary Vote of last year. If my attention had been called to it at the time I should have warned the Government that they were endangering the possibility of the day being counted as an Allotted Day. But nobody raised the point that day, and it was only on the following day that my attention was called to it. Now the rule states that not more than twenty days are to be allotted to Supply, provided that a day occupied by the consideration of Estimates supplementary to those of the previous session shall not be included. The Report of a certain Supplementary Estimate was taken on Monday, but I cannot hold that the day was "occupied" by its consideration, as the time occupied on it was not more than a minute or two. Therefore in my opinion it ought to count as an allotted day, although had my attention been called to the point at the time I should have recommended the Government not to press that Report.

TIME LIMIT FOR SPEECHES.

MR. CATHCART WASON (Orkney and Shetland) was understood to ask the Prime Minister whether, in view of the limited time devoted to business, the constant repetition, the redundancy of adjectives, and the fact that in ten minutes a Member could speak sufficient to fill a column of The Times, he would allow the question of imposing a time limit to be submitted to and considered by the Committee on Procedure.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I have not noticed whether there is any Bill or Motion on the Papers of the House on the subject of a time limit for speeches. Personally, I am in favour of such a limit, and have often voted for it on past occasions. I do not know whether that is a subject of which the Procedure Committee will naturally take cognizance, but I will bring it to the attention of my right hon. friend the chairman of that Committee.

COMMITTEE ON PROCEDURE.

Mr. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.) asked when if the House would have an opportunity of discussing the interim Report of the Committee on Procedure presented that day.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said the House certainly ought to proceed with the consideration of the first Report of the Procedure Committee in reference to the hours of meeting as early as possible, as the subject was urgent.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I have to ask what is the business of the House for next week, and if it is proposed to take the Army Bill after twelve o'clock, seeing that it has only been circulated this morning, and it is desired that hon. Members should have an opportunity of considering the alteration which it is proposed to introduce.

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: On Monday the Workmen's Compensation Bill and the Trades Disputes Bill will be introduced.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Under the Ten Minutes Rule?

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No. On Tuesday it is proposed to take the Second Reading of the Merchant Shipping Bill. On Wednesday we shall proceed with the introduction of certain other Bills; probably the Justices of the Peace (Qualification) Bill will be taken. On Thursday there will be Army Estimates to be followed by Civil Service Estimates. I understand that the Amendments to the Army Annual Bill are not of a controversial character, but it will not be proceeded with after twelve o'clock to-night if there is any objection. In view of the early rising of the House of Lords for the Easter holidays it is desirable to put that Bill through all its stages in good time.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR said he was very far from desiring to interfere with the convenience of the other House, but he did not know that in such a matter they need modify their own arrangements for business. Personally he had no desire to object to the Second Reading of the Bill, and might not feel moved to object to any of the details, but he had a lively recollection of the great difficulty he experienced when in office in dealing with this measure. He well remembered how Amendments were always opposed, and how he had the unpleasant duty of suppressing the zeal of the successive Secretaries of State for introducing modifications. He hoped the Government therefore was not attempting to force the measure. Was it proposed to take any other business that day?

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The Committee Stage of the Consolidated Fund Bill.

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: That is a stage on which there can be no debate. Will no other debateable matter be taken except getting the Speaker out of the chair?

Sir H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Yes, up to twelve o'clock if there is time.

SUPPLY (CIVIL SERVICES AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES).

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. MURPHY (Kerry, E.) said that as he happened to be fortunate in the ballot it was his duty to move, "That, in the opinion of this House, the provision for education in Ireland in all its branches (primary, secondary, and university) is insufficient and unsatisfactory, and that the interests of the Irish people have been and are suffering most ruinous injury from the long delay in applying a remedy." Just one year ago it was his lot to move a similar Motion dealing with university education; and, though only a short period had passed away, he confessed the changes in place, position, and condition were as great as if a quarter of a century had elapsed. He was glad of the change so far as it brought into the House a progressive and radical force, from whom Irishmen could expect more friendly consideration for their demands; but there was one disturbing thought for those who could be called old Members, and that was the wonderful improvement in strength and length of the speeches of new Members, who were overshadowing those who were there before. He had the knowledge himself that his Motion was to be seconded by one of the new Members who would acquit himself ably; and these considerations altogether created an uneasy feeling in the mind that was hard to get rid of. He had been thinking, therefore, whether he would adopt the method of using a jolt of silence instead of the half-dozen kicks in regard to educational matters in Ireland. There were, however, so many points to be stated that he supposed he should tackle some of them, and leave it to his colleague to supply the deficiencies as might be necessary. He would not trouble to ask them to decide whether it was the highest or the lowest rung in the educational ladder that was most defective. There were opinions both ways, but there was absolute unanimity on all sides that every part was unsound. That was the view of the Irish Party and the view of the Members led by the right hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh. The opinions on this question were the same when the hon. Member for South Belfast riveted the attention of his Queen's Island followers upon it, or when the hon. Member for West Kerry discoursed upon it down in Kerry where the Dingle railway dragged its slow length along. Even the hon. Member for North Louth, whose seat was untouched in the excitement of the last election, spoke for his Party in no uncertain voice upon these educational topics. Therefore, they were presenting a united demand to a new Chief Secretary and a new Government that could not be denied and ought not to be delayed. If they took the equivalent grants for education in Ireland, what did they find? At first they were to get the Goschen ration of England 80, Scotland 11, and Ireland 9; but it was never observed, though a promise was given that it should not be varied. After a lot of disputing an attendance ratio was fixed instead, though if that were adopted at first the proporton would have been England 80, Ireland 10·8. England's population, however, went up and Ireland's went down unfortunately, and they had lost accordingly over £260,000 in the last ten years. Even in the last Estimates they did not give Ireland nearly as much as England or Scotland per head of population. To make matters worse the equivalent grant was merged for sinister purposes in what was called the development grant, in order that it should be diverted from proper and necessary purposes; and the late Chief Secretary made it a defence for using the money for other purposes that he was asked by Irish Members to do so. The money was spent on broken-down landlords and broken-down railways, instead of in building up Irish education as it should be. For whom was the system of education necessary to be built up? For the children of to-day who would be the men and women of to-morrow. 28 per cent. of those children were under seven years of age, and, without doing it decently or openly, or after consultation with the managers, the parents, or the teachers, they inflicted serious injury on them under cover of the simple title of Rule 127 (b). What cared the Lords of the Treasury for the preservation of that "nicety of feeling and reserve for which Irish girls were remarkable" if an opportunity arose to save money due to Ireland? What did it matter to them if the morals and character of Irish boys were depreciated so long as the means were at hand for effecting "savings" out of Irish education? Then, what about the other 72 per cent. of children attending these primary schools? Was the teaching staff sufficient? Were the opportunities reasonable? Could the clever boy or girl go as far as ability would entitle them? He thought to these questions there would be an emphatic "No" from all quarters and sections of the public. Was there a bit of character building in the primary system and its methods? Certainly the fault could not be placed against the teachers, but against the methods. Who had charge of the primary education of the country? The Commissioners of National Education—four judges, five clergymen, ten gentlemen of no occupation, and Dr. Starkie. It had often been pointed out to the House that they were not responsible to Parliament or to anyone. Their meetings were secret, and Dr. Starkie was their mouthpiece. How fitted he was for the post let the following facts indicate. He went down to Belfast in September, 1902, to traduce and misrepresent the Catholic managers of Ireland. He acted as a Catholic himself to give substance to his statements. He sighed for independent and educated Catholic laymen, and gave an example of what might be expected from them if they resembled himself. For the entertainment of a number of strangers he indulged in criticisms and suggestions on matters connected with education which had only an academic interest in it. He (the speaker) would deal with only one point. It was a sample of the value of the whole. Dr. Starkie made some quotations from inspectors' reports. In one case the quotation he gave was—

The inspector from whose report these words were taken—actually said two sentences before—

> "The managers, as a body, show considerable interest in the welfare of the schools."

Dr. Starkie deliberately omitted those words in order to discredit the Catholic managers of primary schools, and, as was shown clearly by Father John Curry, he was guilty of similar indecent and improper action of suppression throughout his address. Yet this shining example of truth, honesty, and politeness was the administrator in whose hands the fortune of the children and teachers of Ireland was retained. With him at the head of an unrepresentative and irresponsible board there was naturally no progress on proper lines in primary education. They asked that the national schools should be models of perfection, and yet, where they gave an English headmaster 30s., and a headmaster in Scotland 35s., the Irishman only got 20s. Where they gave an assistant 24s. in England they gave him 20s. in Ireland, and into the bargain made rules to destroy his position altogether. They asked the Irish teacher to be a paragon with a salary beginning at £56 for men and £44 for women, and they made rules that were servile in their spirit and intentions. They then laid down a system of grading as to promotion, which it was difficult for the teacher to surmount. The poor assistant teacher was left in a hopeless position. Little wonder that out of the 495 who left the teaching body in 1904 the number who emigrated or sought other positions was 188 and the number who died 172. For all this state of muddle and confusion the country had to pay for administration in Ireland 6s. 6d. for every 3s. 10d. spent in Scotland and 3s. in England. What the Irish people wanted to know was what plan of action the Chief Secretary proposed to follow to remedy these things. How was he going to construct a ladder whereby the child of ability, whether rich or poor, could go from the primary school to the University? The right hon. Gentleman had no right to ask Irish representatives for a plan. His Government undertook the administration of Ireland and the duty was theirs. Irish Members could ask the right hon. Gentleman, however, to state definitely if he proposed to reform the Board of Education and Dr. Starkie, and how he was to do it. They could ask him how he was going to deal with the equivalent grant and to secure to Ireland the share she was fairly entitled to. That was a most important item as, in the first place, while England and Scotland got their full share, Ireland was allowed to suffer; and even what Ireland got was given to purposes other than education altogether. Surely if the very pivot of the system was to work it could only be by offering decent salaries to induce men to work and to draw others towards the high profession of teaching. What was the right hon. Gentleman going to do about the pension fund of the teachers? The teachers had been led into believing that their future was secure, but the House would judge of the shock to the 13,000 teachers when they learned that though premiums were trebled and gratuities abolished twenty-four years service brought one of their number a pension of £4 6s. 8d. per year. It was not surprising to hear the Financial Secretary to the Treasury in the last Government admitting that there were cases of hardship or to see the late Irish Solicitor-General scratching his head to invent an explanation of his advice to the teachers that their bargain with the Treasury would hold good in a Court of Law. An English teacher got ten times as much in pension as an Irish teacher. The thing in all its aspects was glaring and unsound. How did the Chief Secretary propose to deal with this question of pensions they were all desirous to know? Then there was the question of the civil rights of teachers. In England teachers could become magistrates, town councillers, and even Members of Parliament—there was no limit to their legitimate ambition. In Ireland they could do nothing but endeavour as the rule said, "to be imbued with a spirit of peace, of obedience to the law, and loyalty to the Sovereign; and to avoid fairs, markets, and meetings, and above all political meetings, and abstain from controversy." The English teacher could have his intelligence widened by taking a proper part in every legitimate public duty. The Irish teacher was locked up in a circle of rules as ridiculous and injurious as could be framed. Would the right hon. Gentleman sweep them away and raise a deadweight from a body of men on whom an undeserved and improper restriction was placed, the effects of which were harmful not only to themselves but to the community? Imagine the absurdity of a rule which prevented Mr. Maher, the President of the Teachers' Organisation, from becoming a member of a local education committee, while third grade teachers in Birmingham could engage in discussions about trade or engage in municipal administration in Glasgow? When this question was last discussed the last Chief Secretary saw merit in suggestions about conveyances for school children, his predecessor saw a gleam of light in technical instruction. Something better than trifles such as these were wanted—something more radical than trifles in dealing with an important subject. He had now known three Chief Secretaries, and the other day he heard it said of them—

> "The first in plenitude of words surpassed,
> The next was no wise equal to the last;
> A third he came and this at least is true,
> He's surely better than the former two."

Well, now was the day and now was the hour for the right hon. Gentleman to take his courage in his hands. The other day he spoke to a deputation in the Irish language. Would the right hon. Gentleman now tell them that it was not merely lip service, but an indication of a real friendship for the Irish language and customs, and that he would do his part in restoring the language in the schools of Ireland to the place it ought to occupy? In London a few days ago he had evidence of the spirit of those who were taking the subject in hand, and they wanted some information from the Chief Secretary as to how it was to be treated in the future. What was the good of striving to build up technical and higher education on a bad foundation? No doubt, in spite of the efforts of the originators and administrators of primary education in Ireland, good had been got out of it, but that was because, as the Royal Commission said, Ireland had within its shores a people with a genuine love for learning and great natural ability. Why not give them the means and the facilities for exercising these qualities to the full? What was the good of spending thousands on Sir Horace Plunkett's Department, the only result of which was a controversy between the hon. Member for South Donegal and himself as to how much was spent in patronage? What was the good of making the existence of intermediate schools difficult by restrictions and drawbacks that were unnecessary and unwise? Without any notice they reduced the intermediate grant after allowing managers to go to extraordinary expense. The Intermediate Board said that there had been a fall of customs and excise—that was to say less drink had been consumed, and consequently Ireland was to have less money for education as she spent less in drink. A preposterous proposition surely, but not less so than many others similarly advanced in relation to Irish education. And when the management pointed out to the Board a means of relief their appeal was disregarded. Then just for the fun of the thing the Board withheld exhibitions to which in 1905 the middle grade were entitled, an arrangement by which he was told the largest intermediate school in Kerry and one of the best in Ireland lost £200 together. He might go on stating point after point about primary and secondary education, showing they were in a bad state, but they were not a bit worse off than higher education. It was admitted by every Chief Secretary that Ireland ever had, saving of course Mr. Jackson and the temporary Member for South Dublin, that University education was in need of reform. The present Secretary of State for War said last year—

> "It was an urgent question; and the condition of primary, secondary, and university education in Ireland was simply deplorable."

Well he had other urgent and deplorable questions on hand at present, but what had the Chief Secretary to propose to remedy the conditions described by his colleague? How far and how soon would he apply a remedy? One central idea should fix itself in his mind in dealing with these questions, and it was this—the Irish people preferred simple faith to Norman blood—or University education. It was no good trying to separate religion and education in Ireland—they did not want it and they would not have it. Wellington wrote—

> "If you educate men without religion you make them clever devils."

They did not want any more clever devils of the type of Dr. Starkie in Ireland—there was no room for them. It was all nonsense to say that because the writer of the immortal ballad of "Who fears to speak of '98" walked through Trinity, the "Traill of the Carson" was not over it all. The Catholics and Nationalists had not time to wait till they were dead for the benefits of higher education. They wanted it now, and whilst they would look with satisfaction on any effort to settle the revenues, the representation, and the regulations of the University of Dublin, they demanded an intellectual headquarters for the faith, the intellect, the language, and the literature of Ireland. They wanted the form of their motherland lifted up out of the ashes and the poverty where her beauty lay hidden and restored to her ancient position—Insula sanctorum et doctorum. They believed that could be done only by a revolution in the Government of Ireland, but in the meantime they wanted the pathways of progress cleared—the primary schools made bright and cheerful and efficient, and the teachers properly dealt with; the secondary schools developed and made suitable; and the University created on proper and necessary lines. The Chief Secretary could turn from the study of Bulgarian to Hibernian atrocities and at every point find them staring him straight in the face. The right hon. Gentleman might ask how could it all be done—where was the money to come from? He knew better than any of them the waste and ridiculous excess of Irish administration generally. Look at the lawyers, from the Lord Chief Justice, who could smile and smile and be Lord Chief Justice still, down to the Crown prosecutor in every town. His opportunities for reform were great. The police force gave him another field to reap, and the horde of Land Commissioners who, whilst ignorant of the difference between oats and barley, could easily detect the change from whisky to water, and every other department under his control afforded him scope to do anything and everything. Would he make the effort in a genuine and earnest way? If he did he would have the sympathy and encouragement of the people, who were quick to recognise friendly help when freely given. There was a current of opinion flowing in Ireland, deep but strong, between the banks on either side. It went towards the haven of a real Irish nation, and could not be forced back. Let not the right hon. Gentleman try any of the pitchfork pranks of his predecessors upon its waters; but sail along upon its bosom in the confidence that it would carry him onward towards solid ground, on which he could lay the foundations of a better and happier Ireland.

"To leave out from the word 'That,' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'in the opinion of this House, the provision for education in Ireland in all its branches (primary, secondary, and University) is insufficient and unsatisfactory, and that the interests of the Irish people have been and are suffering most ruinous injury from the long delay in applying a remedy'—(Mr. Murphy)—instead thereof."

*MR. BUTCHER (Cambridge University) said that as an Irishman profoundly interested in Irish education and profoundly dissatisfied with the present system of education in that country, he wished to take part in the debate. He found very little to quarrel with in the words of the Resolution which had been moved, but he must say he found himself in disagreement with a great deal that had been said by the hon. Member for East Kerry. He agreed with him, however, concerning many of the grievances of the teachers, as regards their scale of salaries and pensions. He would add that they bore burdens which were not laid on teachers in any other part of the world. For instance, they were often obliged to contribute out of their small salaries £5 or £6 a year for the maintenance of the school fabric. Much indeed was amiss in primary education, more in University education, and most of all in secondary education. He could not, however, pass over the sharp attack which had been made upon two public servants of great distinction. One of these was Dr. Starkie, who by his courage and reforming energy had done more for primary and secondary education in Ireland than had been done by anybody else in the last fifty years. The other was Sir Horace Plunkett, whose signal and disinterested patriotism had been shown in a life devoted, without respect to party, to the good of Ireland. While there was need of reform in all parts of the educational system in Ireland, yet he thought that any thorough reform must begin at the top. It was from that point of view he wished to say something about University education. The moment was in some respects favourable in this regard, as there appeared to be in Ireland an awakening of new intellectual life, and a revival of that native love of learning which had been long dormant, but never extinguished. He went back first to the Catholic Relief Act of 1793, which opened the degrees of Trinity College to Roman Catholics. But that was only one portion of a great scheme. Had it been carried in its entirety, he did not think that they would have been debating the question of University education in Ireland to-day. A part only of that great emancipating measure was carried; still it was noteworthy that in the struggle for Catholic emancipation which followed, the representatives of Trinity College, Dublin, were among the supporters of the movement, and Plunket was its foremost champion. For fifty years and more after the Union almost every Catholic of distinction was educated at Trinity College, and with the tacit sanction of the Church. These included Judges, leaders of the Bar, leaders in medicine, and there was even one Catholic graduate of Trinity who became Archbishop of Cashel. During the first part of the nineteenth century it might safely be said that so far as the upper classes or the upper professional classes were concerned, religious barriers were being broken down and there was in progress a movement towards the fusion of different denominations. The effect of this on public life was a sweetening and a liberalising influence. He came next to the period beginning with the year 1845, when Sir Robert Peel brought in his measure for creating the Queen's Colleges. That measure was at the outset received with divided opinion in Ireland. Catholic opinion was divided, and even among the bishops many were in favour of it. The Young Ireland party were for it, and he would like to read to the House an extract from a speech by T. O. Davis, the poet, in reply to O'Connell's son. They were words which seemed still to ring in their ears the moment they touched upon the question of an Irish University. Davis said—

> "Will you take the boys of Ireland in their earliest youth, and deepen the differences between them; will you sedulously exclude them from knowing the virtues, the genius, the spirit, the affections of each other? If you do, you will vainly hope that they who are carefully separated in youth will be united in manhood and stand together for their country."

Looking back in the cool retrospect of history upon that measure of Sir Robert Peel's, he believed that a little more compromise in the House of Commons and also in Ireland would have given to the Catholics of Ireland a University education which they could well have accepted. He wished to quote some words from the eloquent and masterly evidence given by Dr. O'Dwyer before the last Commission—

> "I have no doubt from reading the debates in Parliament in 1845 that it was the intention of Sir Robert Peel to set up in Ireland in substance a system of education pretty much like that which we are asking now."

He went on to say that—

> "My present belief is that if we could get now at what was in Sir Robert Peel's mind, and compare it with the offer that Mr. Balfour has made, there would not be a hair's breadth of difference between them."

But the synod of Thurles in 1850 pronounced against the scheme by a majority of one, and when once the ban of the Church went out against the "godless" colleges, the condemnation of "mixed education" was carried out with strict and fatal consistency against Trinity College. Henceforth the religious and social cleavage in Ireland became more marked. Cardinal Cullen's influence, strongly ultramontane, accentuated the distinctions between creeds and classes. In 1873 already society was divided into two hostile camps, with, as some one has said, "clerical sentinels pacing up and down between them." In 1873 Fawcett's Bill was brought in. They all knew what that Bill was, and how it opened up all posts of honour and emolument, fellowships and scholarships to Catholics and all others. He would just like to add that it was brought in not merely with the acquiescence, but at the instance of Trinity College. But Fawcett's measure was too late to yield the hoped for results. And since 1873 the gap had rather widened, and the number of Catholics who went to Trinity College had been dwindling, and there had been a growing divergence between two ideals of University education—the Catholic and the more modern ideal. Chief Baron Palles, himself a Catholic and educated at Trinity College, had witnessed before the Royal Commission that—

> "The relations between Catholic and Protestant are not as cordial as they were some fifty years ago," and a Methodist witness, Sir William Whitla, said—

> "The early friendships which were often formed in olden days are now no more. . .and Catholic and Protestant youths are brought up without knowing each other, and with every probability that they will come to regard each other as natural enemies."

One could therefore understand why it was that in 1903 the latest offers made by Trinity had been rejected by the Roman Catholic authorities. The Board offered to provide religious teaching on exactly the same terms as it was given to members of the Church of Ireland and to Presbyterian students. They proposed that the teachers should be nominated by Cardinal Logue or by the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin. They consented to the erection of a Roman Catholic chapel within the precincts of Trinity College if sufficient funds were provided, and to grant similar privileges to Roman Catholic divinity students as the divinity students of the Church of Ireland. Cardinal Logue's answer was brief and decisive—

All this brought them face to face with the question, Could this breach be healed?

How singular was the contrast between the action of the Roman Catholic Church in Ireland and its action in other parts of the world. In Germany the denominations met together within the Universities by means of dual chairs, separate faculties of theology, and other arrangements not unlike those now offered within the walls of Trinity. Formerly in the United States Roman Catholic students were, if not forbidden, yet discouraged from attending Harvard University. But within recent years the voice of the laymen and of the younger clergy became articulate upon this question, and now Harvard was as free and open to the Roman Catholics as any University elsewhere. It was not necessary to cross the Atlantic for illustrations. Let hon. Members look at what had happened at Oxford and Cambridge. Up to 1895 the same warnings were issued, the same perils pointed out to Roman Catholic students proposing to go there as to those proposing to go to Trinity. But laymen made their voices heard and after a severe struggle within the Church the petition of the laymen was granted, and young Roman Catholics have now free access to any of the colleges in Oxford or Cambridge. They were free to attend any lectures on philosophy or history or other subjects hitherto counted "dangerous." And he was told that the Church authorities were entirely satisfied, and said that the faith and morals of the students were in no way imperilled. A year ago he attended a Hibernian Club's dinner at Cambridge, where the undergraduates included Episcopalians, Presbyterians and Roman Catholics. They had a very pleasant evening. But he came away from the dinner in a state of profound discouragement and dejection, for two questions crossed his mind. One was this: Is it necessary that young Irishmen must cross the water and come to England if they wish to know and to understand and to respect one another? There in Oxford and Cambridge they met and mingled in one common life, engaged in debates, attended lectures, fraternised in clubs, and went back to Ireland better citizens and more patriotic Irishmen, because they had learned to understand one another instead of being brought up, as in Ireland, in a paralysing atmosphere of mistrust and misrepresentation. The other reflection that came to his mind was: Can it be right and reasonable that if an Irishman, had sufficient money to leave his own country and come to England, he should be able to enter an English University with the sanction of his Church, whereas if he attended such lectures in Ireland he would do so, if not under the ban of the Church, certainly without its blessing? Bishop O'Dwyer, when asked before the Commission whether there was any hope within a time that could be foreseen of similar concessions being extended to Roman Catholic laymen in Ireland, replied—

> "If it is asked is there any probability that within a reasonable time we will shift our ground as regards the mass of the Catholic people who want education, there is not the slightest probability of it."

In his opinion it was futile to attempt any solution of this University question which did not go on lines that would be approved by the Roman Catholic bishops. But in saying this he was far from thinking that the last word had already been spoken. He was not one of those who said, "There is Trinity College: its doors are open: if you will not enter, the fault is your own." They could not deal in that way with the religious sentiments of three-fourths of a nation. Nor could they say, "Wait till that sentiment changes." Ireland could not afford to wait. He himself had long hoped that within the walls of Trinity itself the solution of this problem might be found, but there were few, however sanguine, who would cling to that hope to-day. He accepted the facts as they stood and looked them in the face. But he still thought that this House ought not and would not despair of finding a solution, though it might be that hon. Members would have to modify and reconsider some cherished views of educational policy. Personally, he did not shrink from the words "Catholic College," or "University." For his own part in any scheme put forward he should look to one thing only, and that was whether in that scheme there was a hope of a University which would work on something like true academic lines. The problem was one of paramount and pressing importance to Ireland, and ought not to be shelved. Outside Trinity College what was there for Irish Catholics in the shape of University education? They had the Royal University, founded in 1879, endowed with £20,000 a year. That University was a political makeshift which Lord Beaconsfield resorted to because he could not get a direct endowment for Roman Catholic education. It had two fatal defects. First it had a defect which was inherent in all purely examining Universities, namely, that examination was entirely divorced from teaching; and that in itself was sufficient to condemn the University. An incidental defect was that for some reason or other, rightly or wrongly, it did not command public confidence as regards its results. The second defect was graver, and resided in its constitution. Every senator who was a Protestant must be balanced by another who was a Catholic. The basis of the system was one of denominational equilibrium. It was strictly carried out, this curious principle of an even balance of religious creeds. At the head of affairs were two secretaries, one a Protestant and the other a Catholic, and the system was so perfectly maintained that there were two hall porters guarding the entrance to the University, one a Catholic, the other a Protestant. Besides, as the Commission pointed out, the influence of the Royal University had been one of "positive destruction." The Queen's University, which was a federal University, containing the three colleges of Belfast, Cork, and Galway, each college being an independent academic unity, was swept away, and displaced by a mere examining board. What had the result been? The classes in the Queen's Colleges had been depleted, sometimes almost to one-half, because residence was no longer necessary, and academic training was supplanted by mere coaching. Belfast had suffered almost as much from this as had the other colleges, and when he urged the need of remodelling the University system in Ireland, it was not only in the interests of Catholics, but quite as much in the interests of the Protestants of the North. The numbers in Trinity College had similarly decreased by the action of the same cause. The greatest disservice which the Royal University had done to Ireland had been to lower the ideal of University life and education; in fact, as was summed up in the words of the Report—

> "Though created to meet the religious difficulty, it has neither solved the difficulty nor satisfied the educational needs."

There was one other point in the Report to which he would call attention. Among the evils due to the want of sufficient University education in Ireland were some which affected the whole social and administrative system in Ireland. They often heard of the dearth of trained candidates whenever the question arose of Roman Catholic appointments in Ireland. Sir Horace Plunkett, who gave evidence before the Commission, said that this particular defect met him at every point in his work. And from another side Bishop O'Dwyer argued that with the new social order in Ireland there was an urgent need of educating the leaders of the democracy. Perhaps hon. Members would recall some pages that were written by John Henry Newman in 1854, just after he went over to Ireland as rector of the Catholic University in St. Stephen's Green. Newman had turned his back upon Oxford, he renounced it, and said that he looked for a University in a more central position than Oxford had to show, and a country closer upon the highway of the seas. He looked towards a land both old and new; old in its Christianity, young in the promise of its future; a nation which had received grace before the Saxon came to Britain, and which had never quenched it. And turning his eyes towards a hundred years to come, he dimly saw the island he was gazing on become the road of passage and union between two hemispheres. Thither, as to the fountain-head of their Christianity, students were flocking from east, west, and south, all speaking one tongue, all owning one faith, all eager for one large, true wisdom. Those words were written fifty years ago. They might say it was only a vision, and perhaps with parts of that vision they might not all be in equal sympathy; but, still, was it not pathetic to think, pathetic to ask, what had arisen in Ireland since that day? What, indeed, except the fabric, the overshadowing fabric, of an examining body? Think of young Irishmen, with their social instincts, their spirit of fellowship, their genius for friendship, asking for a University, and being given — an examining board! Those in this House who looked back fondly to their college days were aware that they learned quite as much from one another as they learned from their teachers. It had been said that "men unlearn in this world what they learned in the University." True, indeed, it was that our store of positive knowledge in any department of learning was apt to run rather low as years went by; but there was one thing which men did not unlearn and did not forget: they did not forget the hours they had spent in human intercourse, in the rivalry of games, in the frank interchange of talk, in the invigorating discipline that came from the clash and collision of sympathetic minds. Nor did they forget, either, the value of their friendships, those friendships of youth, disinterested and unbought; nor, again, the sense of corporate existence which bound together the present and the past. Imagine what it would be if their own memories of college life gathered only round the examinations they had passed, or—hardly more dismal—those in which they had failed! He asked this House, in the interests of the young men of Ireland who were endowed with great gifts, and whose opportunities for using them were so sadly crippled, that, as soon as might be, it would address itself seriously to the duty of opening to them some better prospect of University education than an examining board.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) speaking for himself and all his colleagues, said that not for many years had they listened to a speech which moved them so profoundly as that just delivered by the hon. Member for Cambridge University. He believed it was the first time the hon. Member had addressed the House, and it was to them a touching thing that his first speech should have been a plea for his native land. Perhaps they might be able to draw a happy augury from the fact that no speech from the Irish benches, he thought, ever created more enthusiasm and profound gratification among them than did the speech which the hon. Member had just delivered. If the hon. Gentleman's colleagues sitting round him approached the subject in the same spirit, the task of any Government in endeavouring to settle this great problem would be very considerably smoothed. The hon. Member was perfectly right when he said that in solving the problem of Irish education, which up to the present had proved to the British Government insoluble, they must begin at the top. They could not have any satisfactory system of education in Ireland until they solved this great question of higher education, and that was a lesson which had yet to be learned by those who approached this problem. He was particularly struck in the speech of the hon. Member by the moving and beautiful picture he drew of his own feelings when leaving the social gathering of Irish Catholics and Protestants in Cambridge, and when he contrasted with it the condition of feeling in Ireland. He would ask the hon. Member did it not occur to him that there might be something to account for that state of things in the social system and in the system of government of the two countries? It was quite true that Irish Catholics and Protestants, no matter how wide the gulf that might have divided them in Ireland, became friends the moment they left their own country and went across to England or to the Colonies or to America. The examples the hon. Member had given of what occurred in Oxford and Cambridge might be paralleled by what he himself had seen in the Colonies, in America, and in Australia of men in various walks of life. Was not that a matter which ought to set people thinking as to what was the cause of this spirit which lived among the people in Ireland only? The moment they left their native land the cursed spirit which divided Catholics and Protestants was exorcised, and, like all civilised and Christian people, they became good friends. Must there not be something in Ireland—it was not the atmosphere nor the colour of the soil—must not there be something peculiar to Ireland that was the cause of this? If the hon. Member looked into this question and approached the whole Irish question in the same spirit of sympathy, he would find that outside the University question, in the political sphere, was to be found the origin and source of this bitterness which had cursed Ireland. The hon. Member had said that he never could understand why it was that Catholics disapproved of a mixed University in Ireland, while they approved of it in England, in Germany, in Harvard. He might tell him that this disapproval was not a matter of fixed principle; he meant the disapproval by the prelates of the Roman Catholic Church was not a matter of invariable principle applicable to all circumstances. It was to a large extent modified and controlled by circumstances, and if the hon. Member wanted to know why it was that the bishops of the Roman Catholic Church, speaking on behalf of the Roman Catholics, made the declaration which he had quoted, and which correctly represented the situation, the reason was, in his opinion, that the circumstances of Ireland, historical and social, had been such that, in the judgment of the Catholic bishops and of the vast majority of the Catholic laity, it would not be wise or safe for Irish Catholics or Nationalists to go into Trinity College or to avail themselves of the other mixed systems that prevailed. The hon. Member had quoted to the House the last proposal made by Trinity College to the Irish prelates and rejected by them. He had told them that Trinity College had offered to the Catholic prelates a Catholic chapel within the College grounds, that they had offered a theological faculty, not endowed by them of course, but paid for by the bishops, and certain other privileges to Catholic students. Yes, they offered these things, but they did not offer any share in the government of the University or College. They would still have left Trinity College and the University of Dublin in the hands of the bitterest enemies of the Catholic Church. That was the reason, and the all sufficient reason, why the prelates refused to accept the offer as a just or a safe settlement of the question. The hon. Member had also overlooked the fact that that very division which existed between Catholics and Protestants, which he truly said was worse now than fifty years ago, that very division which made Irish Catholics and Irish Protestants distrust each other, made it impossible for them to accept as a satisfactory University for their people a University which, with all its concession, still left the government of the institution in the hands of the bitterest enemies of the faith of the people. Trinity University was founded for the avowed purpose of putting down the Catholic faith in Ireland, and it had been true to that tradition, and Roman Catholics were asked to accept in satisfaction of their claim the fact that the doors would be thrown open, while the government remained for the next fifty years in the hands of men whose whole spirit was opposed to the Catholic religion. There was another reason which weighed with him, and in this he presumed he should not carry the hon. Member with him. The hon. Member had astonished him, he confessed, because he did expect a very different speech from him. He thought he would have shared the opinions of those sitting around him on the Opposition Benches and would have spoken in a bitter and hostile spirit. But although he had shown so broad-minded a spirit, he was afraid he should not carry the hon. Member with him when he stated a further reason why they declined to accept the offer of Trinity College as a settlement of the claims of Irish Catholics. Trinity College had been from its foundation the fortress of political ascendancy in Ireland. He would take this opportunity of congratulating his hon. friend the Member for North Galway upon delivering one of the best modern speeches he had ever heard in the House of Commons. The hon. Member had said that a new spirit had arisen in Ireland, and that they wanted education to be Irish and not a kind of bastard education imported from across the channel and applied by English methods to Irish needs. The Irish system was a bastard imitation of English education with all the life taken out of it. The hon. Member for North Galway was right when he said that this consideration was becoming more and more important. Irish Nationalists declined to accept Trinity College on the terms upon which they offered to throw open their gates to Roman Catholics because it was and had always been a political institution, the centre and fortress of all that was narrow and bitter and hostile to the national life of Ireland. With all the concessions which had been recapitulated by the hon. Member for Cambridge University, and if the Catholics were to throng into Trinity College to-morrow, for fifty years the enemies of the Irish nationality and the Irish race would be the masters there, and Nationalists declined to be under their government. The hon. Member had spoken truly of a great intellectual awakening amongst the young men of Ireland, but he had forgotten to say, or at any rate he did not dwell upon the fact, that that awakening was in connection with the Celtic revival.

MR. BUTCHER: I know that.

MR. DILLON: But what had Trinity College done for the Celtic revival? They had simply sent their professors before the Commission in order to cover it with contempt and opprobrium. They declared that the old Irish literature was indecent and that no respectable parent would allow his children to look at it. That was the contribution of the professors from Trinity College. On the Education Board, the Primary Education Board, and other boards where the Trinity gang were represented, they blocked the teaching of the Irish language and obstructed and ridiculed by every means in their power the settlement of this question in Ireland. For the last fifty years Trinity College had thwarted every attempt to improve Irish national life. He rejoiced that to-day they had a resolution which dealt with the whole field of Irish education, because on previous occasions they had been confined to one particular part of the question. Before he passed away from the question of Trinity College he wished to say that he thought the present Government was entirely too tender to that institution. He was much interested in the Chief Secretary's statement that he did not believe there was any person in Dublin who could pass the portals of Trinity College without emotion. As a citizen of Dublin he, himself, passed the portals of Trinity College every day when in Ireland, and he felt very deep emotion, but very different emotion from that which the right hon. Gentleman meant. He looked upon those portals as one of the last fortresses of political oppression and religious ascendancy in Ireland. Until that was understood the Government could not deal properly with the question. If the representatives of Trinity College would come forward and say, "We are willing next year to give half the government of Trinity College and the University of Dublin to the Irish Nationalists," he did not say they would accept it, but still they would recognise the honesty of the offer. But so long as the government of the place was kept under their own control the offer was dishonest. He hoped that if a Commission was appointed to inquire into the management of Trinity College it would not, like the last Commission, sit for three years and then report in four voluminous Blue-books which he supposed not ten people in Ireland had read. He hoped that one of the chief purposes of the Commission would be to inquire into the position which Trinity College occupied in the whole scheme of Irish education. They wanted to know, no doubt, what was the amount of Trinity College funds and what it did with them. Trinity College had always shown a great disinclination to make the amount of its funds public. They wanted to know about the government of the College, but above all—and this was far more important—they wanted to know, and this House should know, what part the College played in the general education of the people of Ireland. It was absolutely impossible to have any settlement of the Irish education question until they had settled the University question, because, unless they had a genuinely popular system of University education, they could not have in the country men who were capable of carrying out every branch of education. They therefore required a popular and widely accepted system of University education if there was to be any progress in the matter of education at all. The general state of education in Ireland was most deplorable, and no parallel to it could be found in any other country in the world. The first thing that struck one was its enormous complexity. Here was a very poor people, in a very poor country, but the people were distinguished, as the hon. Member had said, by an intense desire to acquire education. A variety of education boards had been set up, overlapping each other, all with staffs of inspectors and secretaries, and of many of them organised on the preposterous principle that the boards should have on them an equal number of Catholics and Protestants, without reference to the capacity of the men. The one test for holding office was their religion. There were the Royal University, the Board of Intermediate Education, the Commissioners of National Education, the Technical Education Department of the Board of Agriculture, and the Congested Districts Board, all doing similar work, interfering one with another, and each with different ideas. In 1903—the last year for which there was a complete report—the administrative expenses of the Board of Intermediate Education amounted to £15,000, or £1 17s. 9d. per student, for the distribution of £7,000. Could there be a more extraordinary state of things than that? This was in spite of the fact that the intermediate schools were also operated on by the Board of Agriculture and the Commissioners of Education. It was a most deplorable thing that there should be this evil system in Ireland. He would quote one or two statements from the report of Mr. Dale and Mr. Stevens, two English inspectors who were sent to Ireland a year or two ago to report on the state of intermediate education. Mr. Dale said that their inquiries left them in no doubt that the desire for higher education in Ireland was greater than in England. That was a remarkable statement coming from an English inspector, in view of the fact that for two centuries the Government had put every obstacle in the way of the people acquiring education. In Mr. Dale's report he also found the statement that the desire for education was greater in the southern provinces than in Ulster. The number of male scholars in the superior schools of Ulster was 4,541, while in the corresponding schools in Leinster the number was 12,286, and in Munster 8,003. Yet they were told that all the education and intelligence was to be found in the province of Ulster. He quoted these figures only to show the extraordinary cruelty of the policy which put obstacles in the way of the acquisition of education by people who were so anxious for it. The next point in the system of intermediate education commented on by Mr. Dale was the deplorable want of co-ordination between the primary, secondary, and the university systems. There was no system by which a boy of exceptional ability could climb from the primary school up to the secondary school and then to the University. Mr. Dale said that this was peculiarly needed in Ireland, because the boys in the primary schools possessed in a remarkable degree that ability which fitted them for climbing to the higher schools. Consequently, because the parents of the boys were poor, the children were unable to go up the educational ladder. One of the most remarkable paragraphs in the whole report was that relating to co-ordination. The report stated that the problem had been solved by one body of men in Ireland, namely, the Christian Brothers. Was it not characteristic of the English Government in Ireland that it was the one body in all Ireland to which the State gave no assistance? The report showed how the Christian Brothers out of their own resources and funds, charitably collected, had solved the problem. Their schools were most admirable, and boys who were specially fitted for the secondary schools were advanced by a most perfect system of co-ordination. That was an illustration of the way in which education in Ireland had suffered by the policy of the Government. The Government had always refused to give any encouragement to these schools because the Christian Brothers, to their immortal credit, had absolutely refused to subordinate their system of teaching to the National Board or any Government interference. The Christian Brothers were perfectly willing to have certain inspection which would go to show whether their work was well done or not, but they refused to accept the cut-and-dry programme of the National Board. Because they stuck to that, and had the best teachers in the country, they were boycotted, and every effort was made to starve them out. They were therefore thrown back on collections from the people, by means of which, he was happy to say, they had been able to carry on their splendid work. The Agricultural Department had set up a system which clashed with the system of the Board of Intermediate Education in regard to science and art teaching, and now every schoolmaster in Ireland had at least two authorities over him, and he had to be continually consulting both as to the programme, the time table, and every detail of the arrangements of the school. From these two authorities the teacher drew his income. Now the Agricultural Department had taken over into its own hands the whole control of the teaching of science and art in Ireland, and since the Agricultural Department had done so they had succeeded in getting the programme altered so as to give a more favourable position to what they called science and art than had been the case before. At first there was a great deal of exultation over the success of the Department of Science and Art. He had never believed in it. He believed there was no greater danger to a system of education such as they had in Ireland than to overdo this system of so-called teaching of science and art in primary and lower secondary schools, at the great risk of undermining and destroying the really sound elementary teaching on which all genuine systems ought to be founded. And it was apparent as this had gone on that that was what had been done. He read in this report grand descriptions of the enormous advance of scientific instruction among the people, and how happy these young boys and girls were in the laboratories. He had had experience of laboratory working himself when medical student, and he maintained that it might be very amusing for children to watch the changing colours in tubes; but when they sought to substitute that class of education for arithmetic, reading, grammar, and a real foundation for education, he held that they were doing a most dangerous thing. He asked the Government to look more closely into these matters. They could very easily get up a system of examination in these so-called laboratory experiments which might look all very well; but at the same time they might be undermining the whole substance of the system. Therefore, when he read these reports showing the enormous number of young children passing in laboratory work he must confess he was still very sceptical and wanted to see how this was going to work out. There was another point—the secondary schools in Ireland under this system, which was condemned in this report, got their income by result fees based largely on a system of examination. He was convinced that that was a bad system. It had been condemned by the Board themselves. They decided that it was a bad system, and they called upon the Government to substitute for it a system of inspection. He agreed with that condemnation, because he thought the old system was unsound. But he wanted only to dwell upon the great grievance that had arisen in consequence of this system. He thought every hon. Member who knew anything about education would agree that it was of vital and primary importance that a school should know from year to year what its income was to be, and that sometime ahead. But what had happened in the case of these Irish schools? They never knew from year to year what the amount was going to be, and the consequence was that last year they suddenly got notice, actually when the grant was being paid, that the grant was going to be reduced by 30 per cent. The Board had denied that they had reduced it, but as a matter of fact they had reduced the per capita grant. What had been the result? Some schools in Cork had lost £500, others £300, and others £200 a year. How could any man conduct his school if he never knew from year to year what his income was to be? How could he engage his teachers? and what teacher having any real capacity would take service in a country where he did not know on the 1st of January what his income was going to be for the coming year? He asked the Chief Secretary to look into this matter and remedy the grievance pending a general settlement of the whole question. The Intermediate Board had put by, he was told, a reserve fund of £100,000. He thought they should have drawn on the reserve fund and paid the full grants and then told the Government what the condition of affairs was. The present system was one calculated to carry despair to the heart of any man responsible for the secondary schools in Ireland. They were starved; they were incapable of obtaining proper teachers, because there was no university in which to train them. It was based on a totally unsound foundation, because, when the intermediate system of education was being set up in 1878 nobody ever considered whether it was a good educational system or not: the only question was what political promises could be got. Therefore, they had a system condemned by every expert; and, finally, they added to all the other horrors the element of uncertainty. There never was a country which more required a really sound and well co-ordinated system of education than Ireland. There never was a country which had been more cruelly treated in regard to education than Ireland. Until a hundred years ago education was a penal offence; and people were alive who remembered that the schools had to be held in the hedges and that pickets were placed on the neighbouring hills watching for the approach of the police in case it should be discovered that the children were being taught. Therefore there was a great educational debt due to Ireland; and a great wrong to be undone. Yet when this Imperial Parliament gave Ireland an educational system it gave Ireland the most stupid and rotten system in the world. Again, they in Ireland complained that they did not get a fair share of the educational endowments, although as a matter of fact, Ireland, being such a poor country, steeped in poverty, ought to have been granted more than her proportionate share. What share Ireland got, if allowed to do so herself, she would administer economically. But the money which was given was wasted on extravagant Boards. Therefore, he insisted that Ireland had been peculiarly cursed in this matter, although it needed a co-ordinated system of education more than any other country. It might be thought that he was a Cassandra in this respect, but he held that there was nothing in the long list of Irish grievances, nothing which had struck a more deadly blow to the aspirations of the Irish people, than the way in which Parliament had dealt with Irish education. What were they going to do for it? Dr. Dale had said that the present system of education in Ireland was absurd and futile. All the Reports, including the last Report of the National Education Board itself, condemned strongly the delay that had taken place in making the building grants to the Irish National Schools. Practically thousands of these schools stood in need of such aid; and the Report went on to show that vast numbers of the schools were in a state of ruinous disrepair. Last year in July a Question was answered by the Secretary to the Treasury,† who in his reply said that the matter had been under consideration for six years, and that they could not come to an agreement, but that they were upon the eve of one. It was a fact however, that in the year 1902 an Inter-Departmental Committee was appointed, which reported in 1903. The Government would not, however, publish their Report, and for over six years they had been considering this subject with the Treasury. On 25th of July last the hon. Member for South Dublin said that the Government had made a special new grant of £100,000 for this purpose.‡ He asked the right hon. Gentleman if that was in substitution for, or in addition to, the £30,000 or £34,000 a year which used to be allowed on the Estimates for this purpose. The Chief Secretary seemed rather confused and could not answer the question offhand, but ultimately said it was an additional grant. They had never, however, since heard of either the additional or the original grant. He wanted to know what had become of the grant of £110,000 or the other grant of £30,000 or £34,000. Applications by managers had been sent in for four years and the only answer they had received was that the Treasury were considering the matter. He hoped they should also have some general explanation of what was to be done for Irish education, and he reminded the House that a former Chief Secretary sitting on the Front Opposition Bench said in 1904 that it would be intolerable if the English people were to allow any disparity to arise between the Irish and the English people.

*MR. MASSIE (Wiltshire, Cricklade) said he should not have ventured to intrude upon the House had he not been greatly interested in the subject of Irish university education, not only in private, but to some extent publicly. He deeply sympathised with the hon. Member for East Mayo who had described the grievances of Ireland in this matter, and how much Ireland had suffered from the want of a system of public education.

They felt the charm of the speech of the hon. Member for Cambridge, but he had been anxious to see in the course of that speech some practical way of putting the desires into effect. He himself approached the subject from rather a different point of view, but he knew that if he expressed his differences with moderation he should have a hearing from his hon. friends opposite. He instinctively and he thought reasonably approached the subject of Irish university education, and in fact the subject of Irish education altogether, just as he approached the question of English education, with an earnest longing for national unity. He had had it borne in upon him that any suggested solution which did not work in that direction did not deserve the name of a solution at all and had no pretence whatever to finality. What was it which in the history of legislation had precluded a solution and prevented finality? He thought they would all admit that the difficulty had arisen in what was called the cause of religion. If they were to draw their conclusions from the spirit and actions of a certain class of religionists they would be inclined to say that these men regarded as the primary and fundamental word of the Founder of their religion—

"I come not to bring peace on earth but a sword."

That seemed to be their first commandment. But it was a slander to say that that was the spirit either of the Founder of the religion or of the religion which He founded. The sword did not come from those who understood that in that religion all men were equal, but from those who were always craving for preeminence. It must be, and it was one of the perversions of the Christian religion, that warfare was inherent among its followers. If Churches had not fulfilled their proper functions in making peace among mankind, then it became the duty of the State to take up the much neglected Church rôle, to cast out preeminence by equality, and to assuage bitterness by civil companionship. There was nothing which tended more effectually towards peace and towards the solution of difficulties than mutual understanding, and there was nothing which tended more effectually towards mutual understanding, as Matthew Arnold said, than companionship in the same school or university. He believed the spirit of unity was abroad in England, at any rate among the laity, and this had spread just in proportion as the ascendancy of a particular Church was being modified. They were all most anxious that this spirit of peace and unity should pervade Ireland as he believed it had begun to pervade England more and more. Surely it must be the aim of every Irish and English patriot that Ireland should cease to be two nations and become one. The cause of this desirable consummation not having been arrived at was the failure of Irishmen, both Catholics and Protestants, to accept and to work out a combined system of education, and both parties had been somewhat in fault. In the great Irish Parliament of 1783 a petition was presented to the Irish House of Commons by Mr. Grattan, exemplifying that toleration which was so characteristic of him and those who worked with him, against the exclusion of Protestant professors and students from an educational institution then proposed to be created. The petitioners were Roman Catholics but they said—

‡ See (4) Debates, cl., 246.

> "The exclusion of persons professing the Protestant religion appears to the petitioners to be highly inexpedient, inasmuch as it tends to perpetuate that line of separation between His Majesty's subjects of different religions which the petitioners do humbly consider it is the interest of the country to obliterate; and the petitioners submit that if the youth of both religions were instructed together in those branches of education which are the same for all, their peculiar tenets would in all probability be no hindrance hereafter to a friendly intercourse, and that the petitioners having, in common with the rest of their brethren the Catholics of Ireland, received as one of the most important benefits bestowed on them by His Majesty and the Legislature, the permission of having their youth educated along with the Protestant youth of the kingdom in the University of Dublin, and experience having fully demonstrated the wisdom and utility of that permission, petitioners see with great concern the principle of separation and exclusion, then, as they hoped, removed for ever, now likely to be renewed and re-enacted."

The Catholic Bishop Doyle having been asked in 1825 whether he considered it desirable that the Roman Catholic laity should be educated conjointly with Protestants said he thought that it was desirable, if thereby the harmony of the different sects in Ireland could be promoted, and he added that professors of their own faith were not necessary if the students could receive religious instruction where they pleased, and, for those residing in Trinity College, there were sufficient opportunities on Sundays. When the Queen's Colleges were started one section of the Roman Catholics endeavoured to rally the country to the denominational cry, but the Young Ireland party, headed by Davis and Duffy, was against them. The Young Ireland party appealed to the spirit of national unity. A great Catholic educationalist, Sir Thomas Wyse, the Secretary of the Catholic Association, left behind him these words written seventy years ago—

> "To class our national schools under partial designations of Protestant and Catholic, and Presbyterian, is a contradiction. By becoming sectarian they cease to be national. By parcelling our people into lots, by thus keeping them parqués in their respective pasturages, we recognise a sort of inherent incompatibility; we tell the student that it is in his nature to live apart and hostile; we grow Protestants and we grow Catholics for future conflicts; and lest, if confided to their own untutored feeling, they should seek in religion only that in which all agree, we take care to point their attention to that in which each differs. We convert into a law of hate what heaven gave us as a law of love, and degrade seminaries for the universal mind of the country into rival garrisons for a faction."

In 1897 the late Mr. Lecky in this House, looking back to a long experience, gave utterance to these words—

> "There could be no greater misfortune to Ireland than that members of the Protestant and Roman Catholic religions in their early days should be entirely separated."

Let them remember that on one side half the Prelacy of the Roman Catholic Church, what might be called the Irish party, were in favour of these Queen's Colleges when they were started. The other side was headed by Cardinal Cullen. That gentleman was sent to Ireland when he had been thirty years in Rome, and, in the words of Bishop Doyle, was "intruded" into Ireland contrary to all precedent without the recommendation of the Church of Ireland. It had been the practice of the Papacy to appoint such Church dignitaries on the recommendation of the Church of Ireland. Cardinal Cullen, more a foreigner than an Irishman, was the head of the party opposed to the colleges, and it was through him that in 1850 an embargo was put on these unsectarian colleges by a decision of the Synod of Thurles, but only by a majority of one, an abbot irregularly introduced by the Cardinal.

He obtained on April 18th, 1850, a Papal rescript issued by Pius IX, in which it was stated it would be the duty of the bishops—

> "To frame rules to be everywhere observed for withdrawing the faithful from frequenting these colleges."

They might be forgiven, many of them, for looking back with regretful yearning to the policy of the Irish party at that date. It was something to remember that half the Irish Prelacy were in favour of the mixed education of Protestants and Catholics. That was the true Irish party. It savoured of Irish soil and possessed Irish ideas, and he would like to see such Irish ideas carried out. On the other side they had the ultramontane party savouring of foreign soil and having ultramontane ideas which had been the leading ideas in Ireland ever since. Curiously enough Pope Pius IX, who issued that rescript, supported a very different policy in America. When the two sections of the Roman Catholic Church there were quarrelling over the propriety of making a raid on the State for public money, Pope Pius IX sent over Monsignor Satolli to deal with the question. He calmed down the militant section of the Roman Catholic Church in America, and at the Conference of bishops and archbishops the following Resolution was passed—

> "That the Church of Rome does not disapprove of the public schools; that it absolutely forbids priests and bishops from excommunicating parents because they send their children to the public schools, or from depriving their children of the Sacraments because they go to the public schools; that so far from disapproving of public schools, it approves them provided they can be carried on in such a way that the moral and religious training of the children can be provided for."

Monsignor Satolli suggested three ways in which that provision could be made. First, by religious education by the Church in the school building out of school hours; second, by religious education by the Church not in the school building but in a building provided for the purpose, and, finally, where neither of these methods were practicable, then in the family. The same Pope sanctioned the entry of Catholic students at Oxford and Cambridge on the condition that provision was made at the universities for the religious supervision of the Catholic students. That was the principle for which he for one stood with regard to Irish university education—united secular education and separate religious education. He had been told in some quarters that such a system would not now be accepted, but it was not a question only of what would be accepted, there was also the question of what could be justly offered. Equality was always just, and those who rejected equality took upon themselves the responsibility of their refusal and the result of a demand for special treatment, namely, the separation of citizens. It was continually said in Ireland that conscience prevented students going to the Queen's Colleges, but he could not understand how that could be when half the bishops at the Synod of Thurles were in favour of their going. He could not help thinking that if the proposal had been carried into effect to establish religious residences, under the charge of Catholic Superiors, for the Catholic students attending those colleges, the educational problem would have been very largely solved. The Bishop of Limerick, when before the Royal Commission in 1901, said the prohibition of the attendance of Catholic students at the Queen's Colleges was not exactly a prohibition, but a warning that the colleges were dangerous places. On the question of conscience he said it was not so much a matter of the individual conscience as an objection to a system for the whole country. If it had been a matter of individual conscience, then an absolute prohibition would have been issued. With regard to the Oxford and Cambridge Universities the Bishop said that the student minimised the risk by his own personal precautions. The objectors to these Queen's Colleges had been challenged to produce evidence that they had perverted a single student from the faith, and they had failed to do so. The only instance that had been brought forward was a case which had resulted from private conversation, and a private conversation might take place anywhere. The head of the Jesuit College in Dublin, Father Delany, took credit, and rightly, for the fact that Protestants attended the classes of his college. When he was asked how that was, he said that their public teaching was not connected with Roman Catholic doctrine. When he was asked how they provided for definite Catholic training, he said: "Oh, we provide for that at another time." Then what difference was there between the Catholic College on St. Stephen's Green in its public teaching and the Queen's Colleges in their public teaching? The difference lay here, it was not in the teaching of the teachers, but in the authority that appointed them. The Crown appointed the professors in the Queen's Colleges, and the Church appointed the professors at the Jesuit College, and it came out in the evidence before the Commission that in the appointment, or the warning, or the dismissal of professors at a Catholic university, the archbishops would be the final court of appeal as to a question of faith and morals. But the scope of faith and morals was a very wide scope. Cardinal Cullen, in a letter to the clergy dated November 26th, 1850, said that the Divine commission to the episcopacy included faith and morals, but these had a—

> "direct or indirect connection with the various departments of human knowledge, and the exercise of the Divine commission must consequently extend to the supervision and control of every system of education proposed or instituted for Catholics."

That claim was said by some Catholics to be no longer advanced, but if so, why was the embargo upon the unsectarian colleges still maintained? This policy was not the policy of the Irish party of bishops, but the policy of Cardinal Cullen, backed by Rome, and whilst he would not venture to ask whether that policy was wise, he would ask whether it was national and unifying. Experience had shown that, so far as faith and morals were concerned, it was unnecessary. He did not regard Trinity College, Dublin, as yet national, in spite of the fact that the tests had been abolished, any more than he regarded Oxford and Cambridge as altogether national. Trinity College, Dublin, was too definitely Protestant and Anglican. Oxford and Cambridge were too distinctly Anglican, though he would rather hesitate to say, in addition, they were always too definitely Protestant. But, so far as Oxford and Cambridge had been changed in their atmosphere and in the conduct of university affairs—it had been largely because they had not been boycotted by the Nonconformists, who had gone pluckily to those universities and taken the risks. He did not for a moment believe in the Protestantisation of Trinity College, nor did he believe in its Catholicisation. Protestantism and Catholicism should be, in his view, two things entirely outside university recognition. Neutrality was not Protestantism any more than Undenominationalism was Nonconformity. A university was a place where all could be taught on equal terms. Without equality there could be no finality in any educational legislation. What was equality? It was—

> "[the realisation of] the principle which gives equal privilege to all men, irrespective of their creed, and refuses to give privilege to any man because of his creed."

That was the definition given in the course of a very striking piece of evidence before the Royal Commission on University Education in Ireland by the right hon. Thomas Sinclair. He had been told that what he (Mr. Massie) desired was a dream. All he had to say was that he must go on dreaming still, in the hope that in time his dream would come to pass; and meanwhile he could not support any plan which put the fulfilment of that dream into the dimmer distance. And so he, and those who agreed with him, must go on working for that happy day for national unity in Ireland when the divisive policy of Cardinal Cullen should be abandoned, and, in harmony with the views of Bishop Doyle, the Irish party, and Young Ireland, a system of education should be established which should be a uniting ground for all the youth of that great country.

SIR EDWARD CARSON (Dublin University) said the question of Irish university education had arisen upon many ocasions in this House since he had had the honour of being a Member, and he was afraid it was a great many years ago since he first ventured to address the House upon this subject as Member for Trinity College—which always came necessarily into these debates—and said that, so far as he was concerned, although it might not be his own ideal, this House ought to face the real facts as they stood in regard to university education in Ireland. The hon. Gentleman who had just sat down had ideas with which a great many might possibly agree; he dreamt the dream of taking away religious teaching altogether from the Universities of Ireland; he saw the youth of Ireland, Protestant and Catholic, growing up together, learning the same lessons, reading the same literature, and exchanging their ideas in the class room and on the cricket field; and he said: "Let us bring about national unity." That was a consummation they would all desire. That was a solution they would all devoutly hope for, because it was to that stage of men's lives, by intercourse one with another, whatever might have been their earlier associations, that they learnt to respect the views of those who differed from them, and the necessity of modifying the extremity of their own views. But there was no use in talking of that as an ideal for Ireland, for the simple reason that the majority of the Irish people would not have it. The hon. Member for the Cricklade division of Wiltshire had spoken of the Queen's Colleges. The Queen's Colleges were established as absolutely undenominational, and were promptly described as "godless colleges," of which the Irish people would have none. What was the good of going back to a system which had absolutely failed in Ireland? No progress would be made on this question by such violent attacks as the hon. Member for East Mayo had made on Trinity College. His description of it as the bitterest enemy of the Irish people was without any justification. A considerable percentage of the students at Trinity College had come there, notwithstanding the discouragement of their own church, amounting to 10 per cent. of the whole of the students. Had any instance ever yet been brought forward, since Trinity College was thrown open at the commencement of last century to Catholic students, of either the faith or morals of any student having been in the slightest degree interfered with? He had himself made many Catholic friends there, and, although they had differed since, not merely in religion, but fiercely in politics, they had remained his friends. If it was an historical fact that Trinity College was established 300 years ago with a design to put down the hon. Member for East Mayo's religion, was it not all the more to its credit that it should have been the first of the Universities to ask that its doors should be thrown open to Roman Catholics? A full generation, moreover, had now elapsed since its prizes, Fellowships, and even a share in the management had been thrown open to the hon. Member's co-religionists. Was anything to be gained, or any approach to a settlement of this question to be reached, by harking back to the past, with bitter attacks upon an institution which, so far as Trinity College was concerned, had at all events for the last fifty years been only too anxious heartily to welcome Roman Catholics? Trinity College had made further offers. It had offered to the Roman Catholics to pay for sectarian teaching according to their religion by persons chosen by the Roman Catholics themselves to the students who came within the walls of Trinity College. They offered also, if they so pleased, to have a Catholic dean in residence within the college. Trinity College could do no more than they had done, because they had offered to the Catholics exactly the same equality as the Protestants of various sections enjoyed within the walls of that institution. The hon. Member for East Mayo had said that even if they eliminated the religious question he would still object to Trinity College because it was hostile to the national life of Ireland. He did not know exactly what the hon. Member meant by that phrase. If he meant that the majority of the students in the college were Protestants and Unionists his statement was perfectly true. But why were the majority of the students Protestants and Unionists? For the simple reason that the Roman Catholic Hierarchy would not allow the Roman Catholic population to go there and the Nationalists would not allow the Nationalists to go there. Could anything be more unfair than to say that in Trinity College the majority were Protestants and Unionists without stating the reason? It was the Roman Catholics themselves who had brought about the very matter of which they complained. If tomorrow the ban was withdrawn and the Roman Catholic youth of Ireland were allowed to go to Trinity College, then in time they all—because they were dealt with solely on merit—would be just as much entitled as Protestants to obtain Fellowships, Professorships and a place in the management. There was nothing to prevent the whole Board of the College in the course of time being a Catholic Board under the system which prevailed. It was true that if Catholic students were admitted it would take them a long time to attain to that, but anybody who knew University life knew that there was no other proper way of selecting a governing body than to select the members from its own corporation. The moment they departed from that system they got into the old difficulty that had been described by the hon. Member for Cambridge University, whose speech they had all listened to with so much pleasure. But even that hon. Member felt bound to ridicule the system which prevailed in trying to keep up the constitution of the Royal University Ireland.

The hon. Member for East Mayo had said that—

> "If Trinity College was sincere in desiring to get Catholics into the University, will you make us an offer to put a large number of Nationalists on the Board of Trinity College next year."

What a way to appoint the board of a University—to select politicians, and not members of the corporation of the University itself! In his opinion the fault of all the systems of education in Ireland outside of Trinity College was the fact—and it was a lamentable fact to have to state—that on every occasion on which a vacancy occurred in the management of the Board, whether elementary or intermediate, or University, as carried on by the Royal University, they had to consider not who was the best man for a particular place, but whether it was the turn of a Protestant or of a Catholic; be he an inferior Protestant or an inferior Catholic he must get his turn and they must put up with him in the government of the University. He was proud to think that the one thing in Trinity College that was never asked in relation to these matters was—What is your religion? [Laughter.] They might laugh, but it was the fact, and that was why the most distinguished men and the most hard-working men had always in Trinity College reached the highest eminence there. He remembered asking the late Dr. Salmon about the proportion of students, and he said he had never asked about the religion of anybody who entered the College. He asserted that in Trinity College the sole way in which a man could get on the board of management was by competitive examination, with the object of obtaining Fellowships and degrees, so that he could pass up by promotion until he reached the board. He certainly felt somewhat nervous the other evening when he heard the Chief Secretary announce his idea of an inquiry into the system of government in Trinity College, until he remembered that the right hon. Gentleman himself was a University man. He felt nervous lest there should be introduced into the governing body of Trinity College the idea of any selection except by the corporation and from the corporation themselves. What would happen if they were to put any portion of its government under the Executive in Ireland? They would go back to the same ludicrous system that prevailed in the Royal University. Instead of inquiring into the qualifications of a man, it would be the old story — whose turn is it, Protestant or Catholic? Therefore when Trinity College was abused as not being the great national University they would all wish it to be, let them face the actual facts and see what was the real truth in relation to the matter. It had a majority of Protestants and Unionists, but that was not by reason of anything in the government of the College, but by reason of the fact that Catholics and Protestants had not been allowed to work together. He had said this in defence of the University he was proud to represent, and he went back to the arguments with which he started. There was nothing they could do with Trinity College which would satisfy the demands of the Irish Catholic population. They were not satisfied when it was Protestant, they were not satisfied when they were asked to have it mixed by having all religions equally recognised and taught inside its walls. There was only one other alternative and that was to turn it into a purely Catholic institution. That was quite impossible. But they were faced with the fact that if the hon. Gentleman's ideals had not been fulfilled by undenominational colleges, such as Queen's Colleges were, and if Catholic Ireland had not been satisfied with all the concessions Trinity College had made, Ireland must go on with the present state of affairs. He was always being accused of being a bigoted Orangeman, but whatever he might be called he knew far too well the benefits to be gained from University education to wish to deny any solution that could be found which might be of benefit to his country. He had said on every occasion that the necessity for it, so far from decreasing, was increasing. Session after session they gave more control to the majority of the people. Since he came to the House great changes had taken place. They had set up a great system of local government in the country and a large number of offices, more or less under popular control and influence. These places must be filled by properly educated men, for it could not be expected that progress would be made in the systems they had set up unless they were prepared as far as possible to supply the proper means for carrying out such an education in the body politic of Ireland itself. He had always said that an effort ought to be made to secure some settlement of the question of Irish education. While he said that, he said also that there was no reason why they should in any wise interfere with Trinity College.

Mr. DILLON: If you will not block the way.

Sir EDWARD CARSON said he had never hesitated to speak of Trinity College as having no intention or desire to block the way. Trinity College had no intention or desire to block the way. For his own part he looked upon this subject as so important that he would rather lose his seat for Dublin University than oppose this demand for a settlement of the Irish University question. At the same time, there was plenty of work for Trinity College to do for the Irish people. They might want more practical schools, and a teaching more suitable to the larger class of students who went there now. The hon. Member for East Mayo had talked about the objections to an English education in Ireland, and had said he desired to have something different. He was not going to argue with the hon. Gentleman as to what was the best sort of education to give to Irishmen; but in Trinity College they gave an education which suited the class which went there not merely for the sake of preparing to obtain office in Ireland, but which fitted the students for taking the great part which they had hitherto taken in high offices throughout the Empire. They wanted to see that education continued in Trinity College for those who desired to take advantage of it; and they took no narrow view of the educational needs of their country.

*Dr. MACNAMARA (Camberwell, N.) said he had long watched in despair the languishing condition and the neglect of Irish education by successive Governments. It had been said that the reform of Irish education should be begun at the top. He did not much care where they began; but they must begin somewhere, and be quick about it. He, however, had a prejudice in favour of beginning at the foundation, and, therefore, he would direct attention to the condition of the primary schools in Ireland. The late Government sent over to Ireland a skilled English inspector, Dr. Dale, who made a number of very valuable reports on Irish education. In regard to the town schools Dr. Dale said—

> "It is difficult to give in words any adequate conception of the buildings which are classified by the Irish inspectors as bad. In point of unsuitability and unhealthiness they far exceed any premises which it has ever fallen to my lot to condemn in England."

Then in regard to country schools, Dr. Dale said—

> "It is also necessary to point out that in the country, as in the town, there exist schools which fall far short of the standard attained even by the worst schools in the rural districts of England. The schools at Keelogs in the Omagh district, Lakagh, and Kilmorgan in the Sligo district, are among the examples I encountered. They are old thatched cottages, with low roofs, broken floors and tiny windows. The ventilation was most unsatisfactory, and in the winter, when the door cannot be kept open, they must be unhealthy. There were either no out-offices, or they were of the most primitive kind."

There had been a disposition in Ireland to dismiss Dr. Dale's report, as it was said that his visit was only a cursory one, and that he had the fatal defect of being an Englishman. But he would turn to the current reports of the Irish inspectors for 1904–5. Mr. Dewar, who was head of the Sligo district, said—

> "There are still, especially in the eastern and northern sections of the circuit, houses which are not fit to be used as schools. . . . These comfortless hovels are of one type. They have thatched roofs, which admit rain, uneven earthern floors, low walls, small windows, no grates, little space, rickety desks, few maps, no playground, and no offices. They differ little from the surrounding cabins, and if there be a difference the advantage is often on the side of the cabin."

Dr. Beatty gave a series of sketches of individual schools in the Ballymena district. Of school A he said—

> "No out-offices, school house shaky, sunken and adjoining graveyard; floor loose; ceiling low; both floor and ceiling broken; 90 on rolls, but accommodation for only 42; desks insufficient; nine children at a desk of eight and a half feet."

School B—

> "Accommodation for 41; maximum attendance 71; ventilation and light bad; whitewash urgently needed; maps, press, and teacher's desk old, worn and unsuitable; clock stopped."

Probably the clock was ashamed to chronicle time under such miserable circumstances. School C—

School D—

He need not further labour this deplorable problem. The Commissioners said that practically a thousand schools in Ireland stood in need of having out - offices provided. Provision should also be made, they said, for the periodical cleaning of these offices, the cleaning of the windows and the scrubbing of the floors. They also said that they considered that all National schools should be provided with suitable seats, desks, maps and charts and with fires in the winter months. Leaving the question of the premises, he would take another highly characteristic feature, and that was the scale under which the Commissioners undertook the equipment of schools with apparatus. A first stock of school requisites was furnished gratuitously to each school in proportion to the attendance of children, and the Commissioners undertook to make a payment of 25s. for these requisites for a new school with fifty children. That was 6d. a child. In London for new schools there was allowed from 5s. to 6s. 8d. a child, but the Irish were fobbed off with 6d. for the first year. After the first year in London we provided 2s. 9d. additional every year, and every school hall had £5 for pictures alone. In Nottingham for the last opened elementary school 7s. 10d. was provided for school requisites in the first year, against the Irish sixpence, and 2s. 10d. was given in the succeeding year. Turning to the teacher, he had to face day by day a mountain of difficulties which were unknown to English teachers. He was confronted with grotesque and humiliating regulations which would never be tolerated for five minutes in any other part of the United Kingdom. What sort of man was the Irish teacher? He was the most fertile and resourceful teacher in the world. Mr. Dale said—

> "The Irish teachers whom I saw impressed me—with but few exceptions—as a conscientious body of public servants anxious to do their best for the children entrusted to their charge."

That testimony was in the Blue-books cordially endorsed by every Irish inspector. Then as to emoluments, the Irish headmaster received last year the average stipend of £100, while the headmaster in England and Wales received £151 9s. 11d., and the Scotch headmaster £176 14s. 2d. The Irish assistant masters received an average of £79, while England and Wales the average was £110 3s. 1d., and in Scotland £120 11s. 3d. An Irish headmaster was paid less than an assistant master in any other part of the United Kingdom. But that was not all. A charge was laid upon his slender purse which would not be tolerated by the school teacher in any other part of the United Kingdom. Mr. Dale stated—

> "In the country schools minor repairs seem to be more often done at the expense of the teacher; while the arrangements for cleaning the school are commonly left to him. In some cases the teacher pays a caretaker, but most small schools are cleaned by the older children with help from the teacher. The fuel—on the form of turf—is generally provided by the children or the parents, though, in a good many cases, the teacher has to make up any deficiency. In addition to this, the teacher has, in very many cases, to find money for the children's prizes."

In addition to all this, might he point out what was expected from the teacher? The Commissioners' rules in regard to school houses stated—

> "The Commissioners expect that all teachers shall have done at their own expense the following, viz., limewashing; cleaning and repairing glass; cleaning privies and ashpits; gravelling yards and walks, and keeping surface channels in order; sweeping chimneys; making good any damage arising from carelessness or neglect; maintaining fences and gates, except damages from lapse of time, and in case of residences built by grants for teachers of National schools, vested in the Commissioners of National Education, or in trustees. The Commissioners will inflict such penalty as they may deem adequate if the teacher fails to fulfil these conditions."

When he had done cleaning privies and sweeping chimneys, the Irish teacher was adjured as to how he should occupy his time. He was told—

Fancy laying such a restriction upon an Irishman—

> "To be imbued with a spirit of obedience to the law and loyalty to the Sovereign."

He remembered that not many years ago, after a political meeting, at which Lord Londonderry, he thought it was, made some comments, the Commissioners issued a most fantastic rule for the guidance of teachers should they drift into a meeting where the topic might be of a political nature. It was laid down that each teacher present should be responsible for all that was said or done by all the other persons present. That was a pretty considerable order, but it was also laid down that the teacher must promptly disavow everything of an objectionable character which was said or done. He did not see how he could do it. The Speaker in this House would promptly rule Members out of order if they intervened in that way. The objectionable things included anything bearing upon political authority or any criticism of the Board. The public disavowal was to be followed by the withdrawal of the teacher from the meeting. If he followed this course of instruction he would probably have a brickbat thrown after him. But that the Commissioners would not, of course, mind.

As to what was to be done he spoke with some hesitation, as he recognised that we could not have the same system in Ireland as was applicable to Wales and England, and the converse was also true. He had read the Commissioners' Report, and for the first time in thirty years he found a sentence with which he could agree. It ran—

> "It seems to us to be involved in the legislative union, and to be a necessary consequence of the identity of taxation in Great Britain and Ireland that the Irish child should enjoy equal advantages, so far as education is concerned, to children in English and Scotch schools."

In spite of that pronouncement, however, everybody knew the deepening and widening of the disparity which was growing up. This was not only grossly unfair to the Irish child, but it robbed the British Empire of the fruit of its most fertile and adaptable and imaginative class of intellect. What ought to be done? First of all, more money was wanted, and then he thought the money ought to be spent more economically than at present. They should, he thought, overhaul the central executive authorities controlling public education in Ireland, which at present conflicted, overlapped, and duplicated machinery and wasted money. If they took a sovereign which was raised for education in England and Wales, they would find that 3s. was spent in administration; in Scotland 3s. 10d. was spent in administration, but in Ireland no less a sum than 6s. 6d. went in that way. First of all there were the Commissioners, twenty in number, who spent £1,500,000 a year, which was practically obtained from Exchequer grants. He believed that the House and nobody else had any control whatever over their proceedings, and of course they were entirely non-representative. Whom they represented

Heaven only knew. Then there was the Intermediate Board with twelve Commissioners and two assistant Commissioners, and the usual greedy army of officials. It was the most egregious body that he had ever come across. They developed higher education by paying grants on examination results and this system entirely perverted educational aims. They spent last year £85,000. They took nearly £2 a head to examine an intermediate scholar, although the entire elementary education of a scholar in Ireland did not reach that figure. Then with regard to technical education, when he turned to the appendices he found some very curious headings with regard to agriculture. For instance, "Scheme for encouraging the improvement in the Breeds of Horses." "Registration of Stallions," "Nominations of Mares," etc., etc. That no doubt was interesting and fruitful work, but he would scarcely call it technical education. He would sweep away the various central exective bodies which controlled public education in Ireland and substitute for them a single unified central council representative of the people of Ireland. By that means alone could they get educational co-ordination and administrative economy. He thought it was high time that the Irish people were associated in some way with the local control of the primary schools. There were already the beginnings of municipal interest in public education, and they should be developed. It was all to the advantage of the Irish child that the Chief Secretary was a man with a great and detailed knowledge of the educational advantages offered to the children of England, Wales and especially Scotland. He hoped his right hon. friend would, courageously and determinedly, do all in his power to secure the same advantages to the Irish children.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.) said it would be quite impossible in a debate like this to deal with the whole subject of education, and therefore he would only deal with one or two topics which he thought of importance.

WATERFORD CORPORATION AND BRIDGE BILL (BY ORDER).

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. T. L. CORBETT (Down, N.) said he rose to move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months. In doing so he must confess that his interest in this Bill was very recent. It was the cruel fate which another Bill met with in this House a few days previously which led him first to take an interest in the fate of this Bill. Upon looking into it he found the county council of the North Riding of Tipperary very strongly objected to this Bill and had petitioned against it, and on that ground alone he hoped the hon. Member for North Tipperary would assist him in defeating it. They objected to the cost of this scheme which would do them no good and which only affected the City of Waterford. They said, perfectly reasonably and fairly, that if Waterford wanted this bridge at all let them pay for it. The nearest administrative point of Tipperary under the control of the North Riding County Council was forty-three miles from Waterford and the country between that district and Waterford was intersected by very few roads Tipperary was in no sense in the neighbourhood of the borough of Waterford.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny Where is it at all ?

MR. T. L. CORBETT said that, the Members representing Tipperary in this House being silent and gagged, he was compelled to say something on behalf of the people of Tipperary. Waterford was not used as a market by anyone residing in the North Riding of Tipperary and the object to which this Bill was devoted did not benefit them to the extent of a single halfpenny. Why then should Tipperary be asked to contribute to the cost of an improvement local to Waterford ?

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): Not a single penny is asked from the people of Tipperary.

MR. T. L. CORBETT said the people of Tipperary might be and could be called upon to pay for the freeing of this bridge. There was neither reason nor justice in the demand of the Corporation of Waterford. On what did Waterford rely for forcing through this unjust proposal? They relied on the Leader of the Nationalist Party in this House. Though the power of the hon. and learned Gentleman was very great below the gangway and upon the Opposition Benches, as was seen recently when a Second Reading was refused to the Rathmines Bill, the House would, he hoped, not allow him to carry this Bill. The North Riding of Tipperary was not alone in its plea for justice in this matter. The county council for South Tipperary had also protested against this measure, and in the petition which they presented against it, they described the Waterford Corporation as having been grossly unjust. Those were not the words of a Unionist district, but of Nationalist Tipperary, and he hoped the House would remember them to-night, and support him in his Motion to reject the Bill. He begged to move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG (Antrim, S.) seconded the rejection of the Bill. He said that there was only one bridge across the Suir at Waterford and it belonged to a body of Commissioners who objected to the Bill.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Oh no, they are in agreement with us and support the Bill.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG: Because under it the compensation to be paid was to be decided under the Land Clauses Act.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: That has been arranged.

MR. CHARLES CRAIG: And they would suffer a very severe loss. If the Bill passed its Second Reading, he should put down an instruction to the Committee to insert a clause providing that the compensation must be so measured as to give at least 3½ per cent. or the capital sum when invested.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words, 'upon this day six months.'"—(Mr. Thomas Corbett.)

MR. JOHN REDMOND declared that the object and meaning of the opposition was explained in a paragraph in to-day's Times. At a meeting of the Irish Unionist Members, held at the House of Commons yesterday, Mr. Long presiding, a Resolution was passed expressing the opinion that the precedent created by the Rathmines Bill would paralyse the entire proceedings relating to Private Bills and that by way of reprisal on the Nationalists they would do all in their power to impede the progress of the Waterford Corporation Bill.

*MR. SPEAKER: That is not a point of order.

MR. JOHN REDMOND, proceeding, said he therefore asked the House to judge of the bonâ fides of the proceedings. He reviewed the history of the bridge, showing that a Commission had recommended that a new free bridge should be built and that the courts of law had held that the Bridge Commissioners had exclusive rights to have a bridge over the Suir. A wealthy citizen had left a legacy, a new through railway had contributed £15,000, and they had obtained a promise of £33,000 from an old fund in the hands of the Treasury towards the freeing of the bridge; and they now came for permission to buy out the old toll bridge. They could not do so without asking the permission of the British Parliament, which had never even heard of the bridge. The Commissioners objected to the method adopted for fixing the price, and suggested another method, which they had adopted. The Commissioners had therefore withdrawn their opposition, and were in favour of the Bill.

The hon. Member for North Down had said that they were making a demand for contributions from Tipperary and other neighbouring counties. They did nothing of the kind. There was not a syllable in the Bill as to levying a single contribution upon anybody. The promoters were simply asking to be allowed to buy the bridge. It was an aggravation of the conduct of Members who came down to the House to oppose the Bill in retaliation for something with which it had no connection, that they had not read the Bill. This was not a question affecting merely the city of Waterford. It affected the whole of that part of Ireland, and he had had the pleasure to-day of meeting representatives of all the counties concerned, and not one of those counties was asked for a penny under the Bill. There was no power under the Bill to levy a sixpence on any of the counties in question or on any living being. Under these circumstances he thought it was an abuse of the forms of the House, that hon. Members, having publicly announced that they were doing it for the purposes of retaliation, to offer this opposition. He did not know whether the hon. and learned Member for Trinity College was interested in this, but he would like to tell him that it had been agreed to withdraw the provision in this Bill dealing with the fixing of price under the Land Clauses Act, and to substitute the Bridges Act. In that way the Bridge Commissioners had agreed to the Bill. There was no provision in the Bill to levy any contribution on the neighbouring counties, and all the representatives of those counties were in favour of the presentation of the Bill. All that the Waterford Corporation were asking was that they should be able with their own money to carry out the purchase of the bridge, and thus remove from that part of Ireland a great bar to its prosperity.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said from his earliest recollections he knew a great deal about this bridge, and he was rather inclined to say that he wished the bridge had been bought up before, and that there had been some greater facilities for passing over it. The hon. and learned Member for Waterford had appealed to him in reference to this Bill. Might he say that his view was that all these private Bills ought to be allowed to be examined by Committees of this House upon their merits alone, and he rather anticipated that a good deal of the objection that had been raised had really been raised because in the past that which he had laid down as the proper principle had not been accepted by hon. Gentlemen below the gangway. Some of his friends still had rankling in their minds what happened on the Rathmines Bill. [Laughter]. It was all very well to laugh, but it was a very serious business to leave a district without drainage because it happened to be a Protestant district. [NATIONALIST dissent.] It was the only reason put forward.

MR. CLANCY: Nobody gave any such reason.

SIR EDWARD CARSON: The hon. Member for Dublin gave it.

MR. CLANCY: I absolutely deny it. I ask the hon. and learned Gentleman to quote a single sentence to that effect.

SIR EDWARD CARSON: I can assure the hon. Gentleman I do not carry his words about with me.

MR. CLANCY: It is not the first time you have been offensive.

SIR EDWARD CARSON said that neither was it the first time the hon. Gentleman had said that to him. He really had been accustomed to him all his life. He wished English Members knew the hon. Gentleman so well. [Cries of "Order."] He did not feel the slightest ill-feeling towards the hon. Member—they were extremely good friends. After all, whatever might be their feelings about the Rathmines Bill, and whatever might be the irritation felt by the hon. Member for Dublin towards him, he hoped it would not last very long. He only hoped that in future Bills which might affect districts in which they were concerned would be considered by the House upon the merits alone. They could leave all these questions outside the pale of Party politics. He earnestly hoped the bridge in question would be freed, and with that object the Bill should go to a Committee.

MR. T. L. CORBETT asked leave to withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to. Bill read a second time, and committed.

SUPPLY (CIVIL SERVICE AND REVENUE DEPARTMENTS ESTIMATES).

Order read, for resuming adjourned debate on Amendment to Question 22nd March, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

Which Amendment was—

"To leave out from the word 'That,' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'in the opinion of this House, the provision for education in Ireland in all its branches (primary, secondary, and university) is insufficient and unsatisfactory, and that the interests of the Irish have been and are suffering most ruinous injury from the long delay in applying a remedy'—(Mr. Murphy) —instead thereof."

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. CLANCY said after the speeches that had already been made he did not think he would be justified in dealing at any length with the question now before the House, but there were one or two remarks he would like to make upon the subject of University education. He entirely agreed with the remarks of the hon. Member for East Mayo when he said that he thought reform in this matter ought to begin not from the bottom but from the top. It was too much the habit to assume that University education was intended for the higher or richer classes of the population. They had been for so long accustomed to the fact that the revenues, the honours, and the emoluments, of the great Universities in this country and in Ireland had been appropriated for the purposes of the rich classes that he thought many people had come to the conclusion that such an appropriation was in fact right and proper. For his part he thought that those who took that view entirely forgot the history of the University. The Rev. Charles Kingsley, in the original preface to "Alton Locke," drew attention to the fact that the Universities were founded not for the rich but for the poor, that the endowments of the Universities were provided by bequests and gifts of generous testators and others especially for the education of the poor, and for many years after their foundation it was a matter of fact that both the great English Universities were devoted almost exclusively to the training of the poor. In course of time that had been changed, and the rich had come to regard as for their own benefit that which was left for the benefit of the poor. It had been going on for so long that people now had come to think that that was the proper way in which University endowments should be appropriated. Ireland, being a poor country, took a different view. The majority of people in Ireland being poor they were the very persons for whom the Universities ought to be especially provided. It was no answer to this demand to say that they had not many students in Ireland to attend any new or old University, for they would have plenty of students if endowments were opened to the children of the poor just as they had been open for many years to the children of the poor in Scoland. He had listened to the speech of the hon. Member for the Cricklade division of Wiltshire with a feeling of despair. The hon. Gentleman was one who had presumably made himself acquainted with the history of the question, and yet he thought it right to give the House a re-hash of all the secularist arguments which the most advanced secularists in Enrope, Ireland, and Scotland had been advancing in vain for the last twenty-five years. Granting for the sake of argument that what he said about the bishops and priests coercing the conscience of the Irish on this matter was true, how much further did it carry them? Whatever brought about the present state of things—whether it was the bishops or priests, or the innate objection of the Catholic people to enter institutions which they regarded as hostile to their faith and nationality—the fact was plain that they would not go there. They were faced with a situation in Ireland in which the overwhelming majority of the Catholics, for one reason or other, were resolutely opposed to availing themselves of the benefits of higher education, and the question was not as to who brought this about, or the cause of this state of things, but how it was to be remedied. Did anyone in the House, even the greatest secularist, think it better that the people of Ireland should be ignorant than that they should follow the course that they had themselves selected? The secularist arguments did not carry the matter one whit beyond the stage which it reached twenty-five or thirty years ago, and those arguments, if prolonged until the Day of Judgment, would not effect a revolution. He would not refer to the religious difficulty, but he wished to draw the attention of the Chief Secretary to the fact that he as a Nationalist rejected the idea of being forced, as some of them had been forced, into halls of learning where the spirit of English oppression in the past had been the principal thing met with. When he was at Queen's College he felt he was in a kind of glorified police barracks. He felt the hand of the police on him. He felt the hand of the Lord-Lieutenant and his Proclamation. He felt the hand of the Privy Council in Dublin Castle. He felt the hand of the resident magistrate. He thought they all pervaded the place, and he made up his mind that if ever he had any children they should never enter an institution like that, to be converted by force, perhaps, into English Protestants. Trinity College, Dublin, was not only an anti-Catholic institution; it was also an anti-Nationalist institution. As recently as last Saturday when the Nationalist Lord Mayor of Dublin was having his annual procession through the streets of Dublin, the only place where any insult was offered to him was at Trinity College, where the students came out and threw mud and flour at him. That was the spirit of Trinity College, and that was the institution which the children of Nationalists were asked to enter. They would reject, and would always continue to reject, any such invitation. What gave this country at the present time the right to say to the Catholics of Ireland: "We offer you this because we think it right?" If there was a single thing in which every man ought to be supreme it was in that of the education of his own children, and it was not for any hon. Member who differed in religion and perhaps in politics to say: "You are wrong; we know better than you, and because we are stronger we will force our opinions upon you." That was not liberation according to his opinion, nor was it democracy. It offended against the just principles of liberty. They could not go into Trinity College because, in the words of the late Prime Minister, it was Protestant in every sense in which it could be. Catholics of Ireland asked for a college open to everybody who chose to come in and work for its honours, its prizes, and its emoluments. They might get there, if they wished, by public examination. There should be no tests, and on the governing body there should not be a majority of bishops. Start by making it as Catholic as Trinity College was Protestant, and they would be perfectly satisfied whatever happened afterwards. He could not see on what ground that could be objected to by the hon. Gentleman for the Cricklade Division of Wiltshire, except that in the botton of his heart and, perhaps without knowing it, he was going on the old principle of persecution, namely, that the Catholic religion ought not to be tolerated. He would give every man what he wanted in this respect. Those who were opposed to him would only give what they thought right themselves, and force that upon others. Such a thing was intolerable, and he warned the Government that any such doctrine might have a serious effect upon the political conduct of the Nationalist Party. He would not allude to the religious difficulty, but he would say that reform in university, intermediate and primary education must proceed on Irish lines, and not on anti-Irish lines. All these systems at present were from top to bottom not only anti-Catholic but anti-Irish as well. The object of them all had been the anglicisation of the Irish people. The whole system of education in Ireland—university, intermediate, and primary—needed reformation. The education offered to the Irish people was essentially anti-Irish. Here was a verse which Irish children in the national schools were expected to get by heart—

> "I thank the goodness and the grace
>   That on my birth have smiled,
> And made me in these Christian times
>   A happy English child."

Here was their geography—

> "On the east of Ireland is England, where the Queen lives. Many people who live in Ireland were born in England."

The children were not told, however, that they lived in Ireland on good, fat salaries. Every other nation taught its history to the children of its citizens, but in Ireland Irish history was banned and forgotten. But the campaign against the nationality of Ireland had failed, because it was a fight against nature. There was, however, something in the soil of a country, something in being born on that soil and brought up on it and taking breath amongst its mountains, lakes and rivers, and something in the thought that beneath that soil lay the ashes of their fathers. There was something in the thought that they lived amid scenes of past deeds and past glories. It was this something that created within them a genuine spirit of patriotism and a feeling of love for one's own country, a reverence for its past, and a desire to help it along the path of happiness and prosperity. He believed most solemnly that if they could clear the whole of the inhabitants out of Ireland to-morrow morning and plant there a race of the strongest Protestants they could get from England or Scotland, in five, ten, or fifteen years at the most they would develop a spirit of Irish patriotism which would astonish the people of this country. Every wise Government in the world had recognised this spirit of patriotism, but in Ireland it was dreaded, and the love of Ireland, which was what was meant by patriotism, was confounded with hatred of England, which it did not mean. People often confounded the two. The patriotism of Ireland was a love for their country, which was totally distinct from that spurious form of patriotism which consisted of the hatred of any other country. It was this genuine spirit of patriotism which great statesmen for generations had sought to crush, but they had failed. They had now eighty-three Irish Nationalist representatives as against sixteen hon. Gentlemen who were still standing on the banks of the Boyne. With regard to the Gaelic League movement, it was conquering its opponents, who were being forced to teach the Irish language which they despised, and the thing was bound to go on. But to-day, as in the past, the education offered to the Irish people was essentially anti-Irish; that was proved by the fact that there was not a University College or any recognised school or class of Irish history. England taught English history to its children, and the children of France, Germany, and other countries were taught the history of their own country, and only in Ireland was Irish history banned or forgotten. What was the result? Had it been beneficial to England? Those who had been reared up in these anti-Irish institutions—had they become good Englishmen? They were bad Irishmen, but they were worse Englishmen. As a matter of fact they were citizens of no country, and there were some specimens of them in this House. He thought they had a right to ask the Chief Secretary to ponder deeply over this question and to insist that the Irish language should be taught in every school over which he had control. The Chief Secretary himself had written two volumes of Irish history which he thought might be put into the hands of Englishmen generally with great benefit to the Irish Nationalist cause. He hoped he would do what he could for the circulation of that book.

Mr. BRYCE: I may say that I have no pecuniary interest in that book.

Mr. CLANCY, in conclusion, assured the House that, speaking for the laity, they would refuse to avail themselves of any system of education, whether University, intermediate, or primary, which was anti-Irish and anti-Catholic. He warned the House that if they persisted in denying to Ireland what they wanted in this matter the result would not be to the political advantage of England.

MR. WYNDHAM (Dover): I think we shall have a much better chance of making some practical progress with education if we separate it altogether from other considerations. I will, therefore, not allow myself to be led away by the undoubted relation of this question to political considerations. When I came down to the House this afternoon I did not intend to speak, but that intention was altered by the speech of the hon. Member for Cambridge University. All who listened to that speech must have been deeply impressed by its logical cogency and scholarly charm. He put the case clearly and well, because he did justice to the view sincerely entertained by many that a system of mixed education is better than a system of denominational education, and because he confessed that so far as Ireland was concerned we must abandon the hope of the success of mixed education, and consider the advisability of giving denominational education. Any hon. Member of this House who happens to have been Chief Secretary for Ireland in his day must address himself to such a subject as this with a certain amount of disability, for he lays himself open to the charge "Why did you not do something yourself?" My excuse, if not my justification, is twofold. The hon. Member for East Mayo referred somewhat pointedly to a speech I made two years ago, in which I stated that in my opinion there is a great and growing disparity between the opportunities for education enjoyed by Ireland and those enjoyed by England. The hon. Member for North Camberwell later expressed his opinion that if that disparity is to be diminished we ought in Ireland to begin by way of primary education and not by way of the University. For my own part I take the opposite view, and the view which I stated two years ago is the view I hold now. Time will not admit of my proving that there is a great and growing disparity between the opportunities for education in Ireland and in England. As a Unionist, the temptation is for me to gloss over that fact. My second argument is that while I was in Ireland three separate investigations upon education were conducted and no one who read those three separate reports can doubt this great disparity between the opportunities in the two countries. The hon. Member for North Camberwell said he preferred building up from the foundation. This metaphor drawn from architecture is altogether out of place in talking of education. Education must always start from the University. England enjoyed the advantages of University education for a thousand years before we thought of elementary education. If education is given by men who know what education is, that is to say, by men who have had the advantage of a University training themselves, then the advantage of that education will flow down and irrigate all ranks of life in Ireland, and I should expect greater things of intermediate and primary education. But until the opportunities for University education in Ireland are greater, it is wasting money to spend more upon the primary and intermediate systems. The hon. Member for North Camberwell dealt with primary education, but his arguments were directed more to matters of finance and not education, for he spoke of the school houses in Ireland not being good enough, and the teachers not being adequate for the needs of the schools. But that is not a question of education. As to primary education, which is acceptable to the people of Ireland it is cheap, but it is not good education. The intermediate education is not acceptable to the people of Ireland, and it is dear and bad. As to University education, I believe that that which may be obtained at Trinity College is very good, but it is not cheap and it is unacceptable to a great number of people in Ireland. In saying that I do not utter a word of criticism on Trinity College, which is a sort of sister to Oxford and Cambridge. Such a fountain of higher learning ought to be a source of national pride to any country, but it does not follow that it meets the needs of the great majority of the population. I will accordingly leave Trinity College out of what I am going to say, with my best wishes that it may in the future produce great Irishmen who will reflect great honour upon their country. The disparity to which I have referred is more obvious in respect of higher education than of intermediate or primary education. In England, besides Oxford and Cambridge, there are a number of Universities of another type. You have a multiplication of Universities at Liverpool Manchester, Glasgow, and Sheffield, which administer to local sentiments and local needs. I hold as strongly as ever I did that the great need of Irish education at the present moment is that Ireland should receive facilities such as are afforded in England by Universities like those of Birmingham, Liverpool, Sheffield, Glasgow, and Edinburgh. That is not an object which need evoke either religious or political contention. Would it injure Trinity College? If these needs, which are different from the needs supplied by Trinity College, are satisfied, that feud will be appeased, and I believe more Irish Catholics would go to Trinity, because the men who require that class of education will not be abandoning the cause of the men who require University education of another type. I think it would improve Trinity College, and I do not think any injury would be done to the existing colleges where undenominational education is given. I think they would be improved. As has been pointed out, undemoninational education has been tried and has failed everywhere except in Belfast. Mixed education has been tried at Trinity College, and has succeeded only partially. The problem is to provide in other parts of Ireland an education which is acceptable because it is denominational and within the means of those who sought to obtain it. That is a practical question, not a political or religious question. The plea for denominational education in my opinion becomes stronger the higher the grade of education. In elementary education, which is confined perhaps to reading, writing and arithmetic, a strong case can be made out for even secularisation, but when you come to the higher branches of learning it is only fair that the son of any parent should have the denominational view as well as other views of religion and philosophy placed before him. Hon. Gentleman opposite desire that education should be undenominational. But unless the education provided is acceptable and within the people's means there will be no higher education in Ireland in adequate quantity, and intermediate and primary education will be largely wasted. If the Chief Secretary attempts to deal with the question of Irish education I will do my best not to embarrass him either by what I say or by what I leave unsaid.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. BRYCE, Aberdeen, S.): The debate has covered so wide a range that it will be impossible for me to deal with all the points which have been raised in the limited time at my disposal. The debate has been remarkable for some eloquent contributions from hon. Members who I hope will often join in our debates. Let me express first of all the pleasure with which I am sure we all listened to the vigorous and luminous speech of the hon. Member for North Galway. Let me also express my admiration of the speech made by the hon. Member for Cambridge University, a maiden speech which I have seldom heard equalled in this House, for it was remarkable not only for its elevation of tone, but also for its singular beauty. It is extremely difficult for me to-night to attempt to cover such a wide field, and I must apologise for my imperfect knowledge of many of the subjects which have been brought forward. I have endeavoured since I took office to acquire some knowledge of the extremely difficult and complicated system of education in Ireland. Perhaps the best thing I can do under the circumstances is to deal briefly with the points raised, and then pass on and express my views on the general question of education in Ireland. The first and certainly one of the most important is the question of teachers' salaries. There is no doubt that the salaries of teachers are inadequate. They are, as the hon. Member for North Camberwell pointed out, very much below the salaries of teachers in England and Scotland. That is largely due to a fact to which I shall presently advert—the small size of the schools. The schools in Ireland are very much smaller than the schools in England and Scotland. It is the more regrettable on account of that excellence of the Irish teachers to which the hon. Member for North Camberwell referred. Some years ago I had occasion, as a member of a Royal Commission, to inquire into the endowed schools of England, and I found that a number of Irish teachers were employed in them, and I was much struck with the excellence of their work. I was told how glad the people there were to get teachers from Ireland. It was because they had the art of throwing sympathy into their work, and getting the best work out of their pupils. The result is that the best Irish teachers are apt to be drawn away to England, as they can get better salaries and better chances of promotion there. Complaints have also been made as to the system under which money is awarded to Ireland under the Equivalent Grant, and the way in which money is taken from Ireland out of the Irish Development Grant instead of being taken from the National Exchequer. It would be quite impossible for me to enter into that dark labyrinth of the relation of Irish finance to the Imperial Treasury, and especially the relation of the Imperial Treasury to Irish education. Successive Irish and British Governments in the course of the last fifty years have tied a series of knots which it is almost impossible to unravel, and I do not see that anything short of systematic inquiry can clear up the difficulties. I can assure the House that light must be let into it, and that the whole of the relations of the British Treasury to the Irish educational system requires, I think, to be made more intelligible, more practical, and more conducive to the benefit of Irish education than they are at the present moment. As regards the question of salaries and pensions I must be content for the moment to say that I fully admit the teachers have a case for consideration. It does not rest with me, as the House knows, to grant the demand. These demands have practically to be settled between the National Board and the Treasury, and the Irish Government is somewhat in the position of Bismarck's honest broker between these two authorities. But the Irish Government will give a sympathetic support to the National Board in all it may do to obtain funds for educational purposes.

I pass from that to the question of building grants. There also, no doubt, there has been a great and regrettable delay. It happened very unfortunately that the matter was on the point of being settled when the late Government went out of office, and for two months after that it was impossible for the present Government to take it up effectively. I am glad to say, however, that an arrangement is on the eve of being made which I hope will put the matter on a better footing, and on the Estimates of this year there is a grant of £35,000 proposed for school buildings, and of that £5,000 is to be free to be applied in any way outside pre-existing arrangements to which the National Board may wish to have it applied. It is estimated that not more than that £35,000 can be practically applied within the coming financial year. At the end of that year, of course, further grants will have to be made, and I will do my best to see that those grants meet what I admit to be urgent and pressing needs.

Reference was made by the hon. Member for East Kerry to the rule which goes by the name of 127b. I cannot attempt to enter into detail in regard to that. That is a rule which is intended to secure that the education of tender children shall be chiefly conducted by mistresses. That is a point on which all educational experience in England, Scotland, on the Continent, and above all in the United States is in favour, namely, of having that education conducted by women, and I cannot believe that Ireland is an exception to the experience of other nations. The hon. Member for East Kerry went out of his way to make an attack on Dr. Starkie. Dr. Starkie is one of the most able civil servants in Ireland and I do not think anyone doubts his ability. Even the hon. Member did not doubt his ability, but he complained that Dr. Starkie had read a paper in Belfast in which he exposed somewhat freely the existing defects in Irish education. In regard to his statement to the British Association, I do not think that as a patriotic Irishman Dr. Starkie was debarred from stating those facts merely because there were some visitors from England and Scotland present. I hope on the contrary that what Dr. Starkie said there will have the effect of making visitors from England and Scotland realise how much England and Scotland ought to do for Ireland in educational matters. I may say the same thing with regard to what was said by Mr. Horace Plunkett, who, whatever opinion may be entertained as to the working of his department — a matter on which I do not enter now because it is going to be the subject of an inquiry—has certainly shown a warm and patriotic zeal for the material prosperity of his country.

I pass to another question which was raised by the hon. Member for Kerry and was also touched upon by the hon. Member for North Camberwell—the civil rights of teachers. The hon. Member for North Camberwell read a number of rules which restrict the actions which Irish teachers may take in regard to going to political meetings and taking part in political controversies. It must be remembered that school teachers in Ireland are members of the Civil Service to a greater extent than they can be said to be either in England or Scotland. They are all paid by the State. I do not therefore think they can expect to have quite the same freedom as ordinary private citizens of taking part in politics, because everybody knows that civil servants in England do not take the same part that ordinary private citizens do. But the rules, though unduly stringent, are in point of fact not enforced. Teachers in Ireland enjoy a good deal more practical freedom than might be gathered from the statement made by the hon. Member for East Kerry.

MR. BRYCE: I do not know the nature of the case referred to by the hon. Member, but, of course, it can easily be understood that for a teacher to be concerned in the local government of the area where he is a teacher might be open to some difficulty. But not knowing the particulars of the case, or how far that principle finds application in it, I cannot say more.

Let me say a word about the Gaelic language. I am entirely in sympathy with the desire to promote the study of the Irish tongue. I think it impossible to suppose that it can ever encroach on the study of English. It is the duty of the education authorities not to infringe on the study of the necessary subjects of elementary instruction, but, subject to that, I believe it to be a good thing for the Irish people that they should take a patriotic interest in their own tongue, which is ennobled by a rich and very interesting literature, with a peculiar imaginative quality of its own, and is associated in their minds with the traditions of their country, which I hope they all desire that they should cherish. I look upon the Gaelic revival with nothing but sympathy, and I hope that such provisions may be made as will give encouragement to the study of Irish in the Irish schools. I do not think that the plan under which the Irish language was taught was satisfactory. I do not think it gave satisfactory results, and I am in communication with the Treasury on the subject of framing a plan which I hope will give due encouragement to the teaching of the language, and be attended with satisfactory results. The Treasury has received in a sympathetic spirit the proposals I have made to them; I hope to be able before long to announce the result of these negotiations.

Some reference has also been made to the grants made by the Intermediate Education Board. It is quite true that these grants had to be cut down, and I sympathised with the hon. Member for North Galway when he said it was a little hard that the only way in which Irishmen could get education was by drinking more. It is particularly hard because the more education you get the less you want to drink. I am told that the study of Irish and the influence of the Gaelic League has been everywhere accompanied by a diminution in intemperance. I think the subject of the grants by the Intermediate Education Board does require to be inquired into. I agree also that the cost of administration in connection with that Board is a great deal too high. It is an extravagant proportion of the total funds at its disposal to spend so large a sum as £20,000 in the actual work of administration and examination.

These are only a few of the many points on which I should have liked to dwell in detail. I think I shall do better to pass to some general considerations. Let me state briefly what seem to be the salient defects in Irish education at present. I am afraid I must say of Irish education, on a survey of it as a whole what Mephistopheles said in Goethe's Faust about human nature—Ich finde es herzlich schlecht ("I find it heartily bad.") There is no branch of Irish education which can be pronounced to be satisfactory. I begin with the defects of primary education. The Irish schools are much too small, and the payments to the teacher are low partly because the schools are so small. In Ireland there are 9,000 primary schools, and in England, 30,000, but the proportion to the population of Ireland and the population of England is one-seventh. There are more than three-fifths of the primary schools in Ireland where the average attendance is less than fifty. Of course it is impossible that these small schools should pay such good salaries or give such efficient instruction as larger schools. The number of schools in Ireland with only one teacher is inordinately large, and it is in consequence of that that there has been so little promotion and so very little relation between the size of the school and the teacher's pay. A school with an attendance not exceeding fifty pays to the teacher as much as an English teacher receives, but an Irish teacher in a larger school, with greater work, and where there ought to be promotion, is paid very much worse than an English teacher. The report of the Commissioners on National Education of 1904 shows that the smallness of the schools in Ireland is due mainly to two causes which certainly ought to be removed. One is that the population is sparse in the country districts, and the other is the objection on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy to boys and girls being taught together, and the disinclination of the various denominations to use each other's schools. In the north of Ireland most of those small schools owe their origin to the claims of the various Protestant denominations to have schools provided at the cost of the State for each of them. The amalgamation of the schools is desirable so that there may be two teachers in each. I refer particularly to the existence of small Protestant schools maintained by different denominations in the north of Ireland. I understand, but I do not argue at this moment, why Protestant and Catholics desire to have separate schools. We shall hear more than enough of that before long, but with regard to the different Protestant denominations—Presbyterian, Episcopalian, Methodist, and so on—what possible reason is there why they should keep up separate schools? It is the sheerest waste of labour and money. I respectfully appeal to hon. Members from the north of Ireland, some Presbyterian and some Episcopalian, to consider whether they cannot induce the members of their respective denominations to get rid of this waste of labour and waste of money.

Now I come to the case of buildings It is one great evil in the Irish schools that the buildings are so inferior, and the matter is more serious than has been mentioned in the House. One result of the insanitary buildings is that when any epidemic disease breaks out all the children in the school take it at once, and these epidemics break out far more frequently than in English and Scotch schools. The consequence is that the work of the school is disorganised, much time is lost, and the educational results obtained in the year are perhaps only half what they should be. That brings me to another branch of the school system—the irregular attendance and the want of compulsion. There is a very partial compulsion in Ireland under the Act of 1892. Under that Act school attendance committees were appointed, but compulsion was very imperfectly applied. Not only is attendance extremely irregular, but the hours are short. I remember that I as a boy, I am sorry to say, went to school at nine o'clock and continued there until two or three. We got at least five hours good hard schooling every day. That was in Scotland. But in some Irish schools the children do not attend until half-past ten or eleven o'clock, and leave at two, the average of school time being two and-half or three hours. [Cries of "No, no."] I do not say it is the case everywhere, but it is so in many instances. Add to this the irregular attendances, and the interruptions from epidemics, and it is quite plain how educational results have been comparatively poor. [AN HON. MEMBER: Long distances.] Yes, no doubt the difficulties are great, and it is a country where, I think, the people do not get up so early as they ought to do. But these are curable defects, and they would be largely remedied if the education was better, the schools more comfortable and attractive, and the teachers had greater encouragement. There is another great defect which militates against the efforts of the best teachers in Ireland. There is a want of local interest and local co-operation which when it exists does very much for schools, and which certainly has been one of the principal causes of the excellent results obtained in Scotland and England. I do not say anything against the managers of the Irish schools. Many of them, I think, have a difficult task. They stand alone in districts in the north and the south in communities where the doctor and the priest are almost the only educated men. The priest in many cases makes the best efforts in his power to bring the children to school. I have had a great deal of testimony as to the effort which the priests make, and as to the support they give to the schoolmasters, but, of course, it is a great drawback not to have an active local public opinion. One of the best things that could be done for the schools of Ireland would be to create something like a body of local managers, or something like local government which would endeavour to give an interest in the school. I am well aware of the enormous difficulty of the task. I am prescribing this as a counsel of perfection. I cannot say that at present I see my way to perfect such a scheme. It has been constantly suggested that the schools ought to be supported out of the local rates, but having regard to the poverty of Ireland it would be very difficult to impose on the local rates a burden equivalent to the school rates in England, and unless you have local contributions you lack one of the most powerful motives for bringing in the people to assist in the work of the schools. I do not despair of some remedy, but I do not think it can be done by any legislation which can be proposed to this Parliament. It must also I think be added that the centralisation of Irish education, the practice of referring everything to the National Board which appoints and pays the teachers, has an unfortunate effect on the system. A highly centralised system of that kind is obliged to become rigid; it cannot have the flexibility of the English and Scottish systems. Therefore I should not only like to see the people associated with the work, but I should wish for less centralisation than we have at the present time.

Now I pass to intermediate education. It fulfils one of the most important functions in the country. It ought to provide for the whole of secondary education. What is the Board of Intermediate Education? It is only an examining body awarding grants to schools and pupils on the results of passes—in other words it holds out prizes which can be obtained by crammers, and which I am afraid are very often obtained by crammers. That is the fault not of the board, but of the legislation which called the system into existence, and the system is utterly wrong. What you want to do is to foster the schools, to encourage the best teachers, and to give them the benefit of enlightened inspection. It is also completely disjoined from technical education, which is under the Agricultural Department. I entirely agree with the hon. Member for East Mayo as to the danger of setting children to work on technical subjects when they are only imperfectly grounded in primary subjects and the earlier part of secondary education. I desire nothing more than to see a complete review of technical instruction as given in Ireland in order to bring it into proper relation to primary and secondary education, and to see that it is not commenced to be given until pupils are properly fitted to receive it.

From this I come to University education, upon which a good deal of our time has been occupied during the discussion. There has been a universal consensus of opinion that the system in Ireland is altogether unsatisfactory. There are not two opinions upon that. The Royal University has been severely condemned, and I would be the last to differ from the general opinion, for in 1880, when the last step was taken to destroy the old Queen's University and to substitute the Royal University, I was almost the only person who opposed the scheme, maintaining that it would necessarily have the results which experience has shown it has had. The most effective condemnation has been given by the Royal University itself, which has recently passed a resolution with unanimity saying that experience had shown that as an examining board it was entirely unsatisfactory and that it ought to be turned into a teaching University.

Many appeals have been made as to what could be done for University education in Ireland. I am sorry to say that I am not in a position to make any statement on that subject, and for two reasons. In the first place, the Government have not yet been long enough in office since the general election to enable them to formulate a policy upon a subject of such confused difficulty; and, in the second place, they feel and everybody feels that this is a case in which there is no use proposing a scheme until they have reasonable prospect of carrying it. The shore is strewn with the wrecks of previous attempts to deal with this question. We all remember the famous attempt of Mr. Gladstone in 1873, the attempt made when the Royal University was created, which is admitted now to be a failure; then there was the attempt made by the Leader of the Opposition seven or eight years ago when he was on the brink of launching a new Irish University scheme, but was obliged to abandon it because he could not obtain sufficient support; and we all remember that three years ago the right hon. Member for Dover was also on the brink of launching a scheme, but recoiled from the difficulties before his path. With these warnings before us, I think the House will see that it would not be prudent for any Government to propose a scheme until they were assured that the scheme had some chance of being accepted and carried. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition in thinking that this is a reform which ought to be effected, I will not say with the general consent of all Parties, for that is too much to expect, but with the support of different elements of public opinion in the country which would enable the Government to carry it through. I assure hon. Gentlemen opposite that this subject is engaging the constant attention of the Government. I do not despair. I hope it may be found possible to reconcile the conflicting views which have caused so long and lamentable a delay. I quite agree in the urgency of the case, and I subscribe to the view of the hon. Member for Cambridge University about the supreme importance of Ireland's having University education. I believe that nothing would do more to pacify men's minds in Ireland, and also to enable Irishmen to work out in the best and wisest way any scheme of self-government that may be entrusted to them. Therefore, I can assure the House that this subject will not be lost sight of for a moment.

Having endeavoured to show what are the chief difficulties of the existing system, I hope I may be permitted to pass now to the reforms that can be introduced. I have been a little disappointed at the absence of practical suggestions. The evils of the existing system have been pointed out, but I have had no suggestions which I can submit to the Irish National Board of Education for carrying out reforms. I will enumerate some which occur to me. One is the consolidation of the small schools. Another is the improvement of school buildings. A third is the association of the people in the locality with the work of the school. A fourth is the improvement of the attendance, and, if possible, an attempt to make the so-called compulsory system more effective. I am not saying that these things are easy. But they ought to be done if they can be done, and some day they will have to be done. Another reform is the union in one system of primary and secondary education. No one can look at Irish Education without feeling that the National Board and the Intermediate Board ought to be consolidated, and technical education ought to be brought into better organic relation with primary and secondary education. At present there does not exist in Ireland the means, which has so long existed in Scotland, of enabling promising children to rise from the primary schools through the secondary schools to the Universities. That is one of the very first things to be done, and I do not see how it can be done while we have the control of primary and secondary education placed under different bodies. We want one education department for Ireland, but how are we to get that? If we were to create an education department for Ireland like the English Education Department and place it under the control of the Irish Government, it would be said that we were bringing another thing into the Castle, and all the prejudice which is supposed to attach to the Castle would immediately attach to the education department. That prejudice is, I think, not altogether deserved, for there are in Dublin Castle a great many able and competent men. But I entirely understand that point of view, and I do not say that I have not some sympathy with it. It may be said, Why not have an elected responsible body? But how can you create an elected responsible body in Ireland for education only? If you go so far as that you will have to go a great deal further. [" Hear, hear," from the IRISH Benches, and cries of "Home Rule."] That at once raises the whole problem. And if I were to suggest what would seem to be one of the most obvious remedies, and bring this Irish education department under the control of the Irish Government, there would be great objections to that. Hon. Members from England and Scotland do not know that the Irish Government has no control over the board of education. All that the Lord Lieutenant and the Chief Secretary can do is to disallow certain rules from having immediate effect. And in regard to the Intermediate Education Board we have even less power.

That brings me to the point that the want of money is one of the great difficulties in the way of effecting some of the most necessary reforms. I rather sympathise with the view of Irish Members that it is a pity to draw on the Development Grant except for the purposes of education. It was rather unfortunate that it was drawn upon for other purposes, though these were at the time important and urgent. All I can do is to plead for a liberal treatment of Irish education, for without more money I do not suppose much more can be done than at present. But another difficulty is the great division of opinion that prevails in regard to education and which makes the matter more interlaced with the religious controversy than it is in England. There is hardly a branch of education into which some element of political or religious controversy may not enter. And therefore one asks, when one comes to consider what ought to be done in Ireland, what is the public opinion to which we are to appeal? In England we can appeal to public opinion and get a pretty fair judgment, but in Ireland it is a great deal more difficult to learn, because, owing to the want of local government, owing to the whole history of Ireland, public opinion is not accustomed to express itself with the same fulness and freedom on all these questions apart from politics that it does in England. And yet we can do nothing in Ireland without having public opinion behind us. Then, how are we to effect these reforms? The most obvious thing would be to pass legislation in the Imperial Parliament. I suppose I shall be told by some Members of the House that legislation in the Imperial Parliament upon a purely Irish subject would be received, rightly or wrongly, with a certain measure of suspicion. It will be said, and said with truth, that the Imperial Parliament does not know the facts, and it will be asked how can the Imperial Parliament legislate for Ireland knowing so little about the conditions of Ireland? It may be said, why should not the Imperial Parliament pass such legislation as the Irish Members ask them to pass? Well, but the Imperial Parliament does not want to legislate in the dark, and I do not know that it can be expected to do so. I do not think it is fair to ask English Members to vote blindly upon very important questions, and perhaps be ruled by the opinions of the Irish Members, without knowing about the facts with which they are faced. We would not dream of legislating in this Parliament for India, and yet there are many branches of Irish administration and many facts in Irish society, facts social and moral, about which the average English Member does not know much more than he does about India. Scotland is practically allowed to legislate for herself, and if I were asked why, I should say—study the history of Ireland and Scotland since the succession of the Hanoverian dynasty. I will frankly say that I do not think that Irish opinion is by any means ripe for all the reforms which higher education needs, and I am certain that there are some things which ought to be done for Irish education which Irish opinion would not dictate. Yet I would be very sorry to impose those reforms on Ireland by the superior will and strength of Parliament. I think that the reforms when they come ought to be willingly accepted by the people of Ireland. I need not draw the moral. Those who follow Irish affairs there will find a great many opportunities of applying the morals which I have endeavoured to set before the House.

I do not despair of the position. The first thing needed by any one who proposes to administer Ireland is an abundant stock of optimism, and I would be very sorry to preach counsels of despair. After all, things were a great deal worse in many respects in Ireland fifty or 100 years ago, and I do not see why the progress attained in other directions should not be attained in education also. There are some things that I hope we may begin upon at once. I hope that we may begin to improve the position of teachers and the state of the schools, and also to consider by what means the different education authorities may be consolidated. But there are other things which I can not hold out much hope will be done at once by legislation in this House. But I do not see any reason why with good will and a spirit of compromise on all sides something should not be done to settle the problem of University education. At all events it is always something that we should know what the defects are and what are the difficulties which we have to confront. The great trouble in Ireland has been that she has so long been governed on a sort of hand-to-mouth policy and by temporary expedients. The question of education is certainly for Ireland of supreme importance, whether you begin its reform at the top or the bottom. Ireland has a damp climate unfavourable to arable cultivation. She is very imperfectly supplied with rich mineral deposits which have done so much for the prosperity of England and Scotland; and consequently, owing to the unhappy history of the last three centuries, she has fallen behind her sister countries of England and Scotland. But she has one great asset and that is the intellectual capacity of her people. I believe that there is no people in Europe more fond of learning, more anxious for knowledge, or with a readier intelligence than the Irish. Is it not tragic that so little use has been made of this aptitude? There is an Irish legend that off the coast of Clare lay a happy and beautiful island which once a year was visible above the waste of the Atlantic, but which the people could never approach. That is the symbol of the possibilities that are denied to Ireland by the present waste of her great intellectual capacity. That capacity it should be one of the first objects of statesmanship to develop as far as possible. It is the duty of this country to give the natural gifts of the Irish people, from which she has reaped so much advantage, their fitting training and due opportunity; and any efforts so made or money so spent would be for the common good of Great Britain and Ireland.

MR. WALTER LONG (Dublin, S.): We ought to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the very frank and fair statement that he has made to the House. At the same time, those who have listened to the right hon. Gentleman must have come to the conclusion that the debate has not brought much nearer the realisations of those hopes that have been expressed that evening. The right hon. Gentleman has approached the main question with benevolence, but he has not held out any hope of its immediate solution.

MR. BRYCE: I guarded myself against making any statement for the present; but I said nothing about the future.

MR. WALTER LONG: At present there is no answer to be made; and I think that that is a justification of the view taken by the hon. Member for North Camberwell. My right hon. friend the Member for Dover says that the only way is to deal with the University question first, but I submit that we must deal with facts as we find them, and it would be a disaster for Ireland if, owing to the difficulties of dealing with the University question, action in regard to elementary and intermediate education, which are of the greatest possible importance, were to be postponed. It was with view to dealing with some of these difficulties in connection with intermediate education that I had arranged a conference of education authorities so as to prevent overlapping. Has that conference reported?

MR. BRYCE: There was a Report, but I must confess that it did not seem to carry the thing much further; and I am afraid that the system of co-operation will not get rid of the difficulties which arise from the existence of three independent authorities.

MR. WALTER LONG: I think it would be within the discretion of the right hon. Gentleman to present the Report of that Conference to the House. I was very glad to hear the right hon. Gentleman defend Dr. Starkie and Sir Horace Plunkett. I had the honour to work with Dr. Starkie for some months, and I know that Dr. Starkie deserves the highest praise, as having at all times devoted himself to the cause of education with the single object of advancing education in Ireland. He may have taken a wrong course, but whether he was right or wrong his one object has always been the advancement of education in every way, and to that object he has devoted himself with rare industry and ability. As regards Sir Horace Plunkett, the right hon. Gentleman has defended him from a charge which never ought to have been brought against him, Whatever his failings may be, and, like everybody else, he no doubt has failings, nobody who knows him can doubt that he has spent his life in the service of Ireland without regard to personal advancement, advantage or popularity. In that course he has sacrificed the political career to which he might properly have looked forward, and in regard to his patronage, he has always acted in the most honourable and straightforward manner and bestowed it in such a way as to secure the best servants for the State. I think it is a great pity that any reflection should have been made upon one who has served his country so admirably. Something has been said as to what the late Government did with regard to the teaching of Irish in schools, and with regard to Rule 127 (b). I am very grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for what he said in regard to both those subjects, because it has been said that the action of the late Government was intended to put an end to the teaching of Irish. That is not the case, and is not an accurate representation of what we did, because Irish can still be taught in the schools in the ordinary way in ordinary school hours. What we did was this. An experiment had been tried under which a small sum was allowed by the Treasury for extra fees which are not paid in England, Scotland or Wales. They were, however, tried as an experiment in Ireland, and they grew to a very large amount. I found when I came to discuss this subject with my advisers what the right hon. Gentleman has said to-night, that while everybody who has any knowledge of Irish education is ready with criticism and condemnations, they are not ready with suggestions for the practical improvement of education. I found that one of the greatest difficulties in connection with Irish education was the number and smallness of schools. The problem I had to face was this: was it better to allow this controversy to go on in connection with the teaching of Irish, or was it not better to come to an arrangement with the Treasury under which the money which they grant for the Irish Development Grant should go to what is of infinitely more value, viz., that in our small mixed schools, where children vary from the age of fourteen to the infant there should be assistant mistresses who would be able to take over and train the small children, who could not unless they had these assistant mistresses possibly be trained at all? The late Irish Government, therefore, took the right course in the best interests of the children, and I believe that the alteration made in the Irish system will prove to be a real blessing to Irish education. As to rule 127(b), the action of the National Board of Education was approved on account of the information the Government were able to obtain that in every country, including America and the Roman Catholic schools in this country, the principle has been adopted. It was in the interest of education and it led to the better general training and education of Irish children. The Irish University question has been discussed with great moderation and a high elevation of tone. There have been suggestions, however that the opposition to the establishment of an Irish university is based on a narrow-minded prejudice and bigotry.

I believe that in the House, in the country, and in Ireland itself, a much wider division of opinion exists on this question than has been revealed by the debate. In fairness it ought to be allowed that those who view the question with doubt, apprehension, or direct opposition, base their views on grounds as just and right as those who advocate the establishment of such a university. It is not a question of bigotry. [" Oh."] Hon. Members below the grangway who say " oh " refuse to recognise the fact that on the Continent in other Roman Catholic countries this step has not been taken. What is the basis of their own demand? It is that Trinity College, Dublin, has, under the control of a Protestant body, become a great Protestant institution, and their own proposal is to establish a university in which the atmosphere shall be of a different kind. No one can rest content with the present condition of things. No one can say that the benefits of university training can for all time be denied to the great body of young Irishmen, but, nevertheless, all must feel that, if a solution is to be found, it can only be by concessions and advances made on both sides. I ask that there should be justice and fair play for those who have opposed this proposal, not because they take a narrow view of the situation, certainly not because they desire to do any injustice to their own Catholic fellow countrymen, but because they believe, upon educational grounds, that it is not a real advance and that any fresh provision ought to be on purely non-sectarian lines, and be governed by academic traditions. I put in this plea on behalf of many in Great Britain and Ireland who earnestly and conscientiously hold these views, who have an honest desire to deal with the question so that justice shall be done to the young men who desire university advantages, but who nevertheless hold strong views based upon real convictions, views which will not be moved by attacks upon them on the ground that they are the product of prejudice, or passion, or narrow-mindedness. I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his frank and fair speech, although I rather protest against the sting in the tail of it, in which he talked about pointing the moral to his hon. friends behind him. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to me to take up a non possumus attitude and to say to his hon. friends—

If that is so, I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has taken quite a fair opportunity of preaching that doctrine to the House, because if he believes that Home Rule is the solution of all these difficulties let him have the courage of his opinions and put them to the test. If the right hon. Gentleman has no policy, let him not fall back on the Home Rule suggestion as the remedy to be taken failing the one he can present, and let him realise that, while it is easy to find fault with the present situation, the solution is one of intense difficulty. The Nationalist remedy for the situation is Home Rule. That is a proposal which will be resisted to the last by the Unionist Party; but if any practical scheme is put forward it will meet with neither factious nor unfair opposition.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said he rose only to record the fact that to those who occupied the Nationalist benches the debate had been eminently satisfactory. He thought there was no reason to continue it. He thought the debate marked a milestone on the road of Irish progress. He appealed to his hon. friend to withdraw the amendment.

MR. MURPHY said that after the remarks which had been made by his hon. friend he would withdraw his Amendment.

Main Question again proposed.

MR. CLAUDE HAY (Shoreditch, Hoxton) said he was anxious to raise some questions connected with the administration of the Home Office. He complained that the charge for licences to cab drivers in the Metropolis had been increased by half-a-crown. The number of men engaged in driving licensed vehicles for hire in the Metropolis was 30,000, and a good many of hem were his constituents. The Secretary of State on the 26th of December last year signed a document demanding from cab drivers an increased fee for their licences. At the last election it was said that the increase of the fee was due to the action of his right hon friend the late Home Secretary, but a little examination of the subject showed that the action of his right hon. friend was confined to that of making an inquiry and circulating a proposal for a new by-law. The present Home Secretary on the eve of an election—and he did not hesitate to say that he had a very definite purpose—selected Boxing Day, when he might have been better employed, to increase the charge for licences issued to cab drivers in the Metropolis.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. GLADSTONE, Leeds, W.): I rise to order, because the statement of the hon. Member is perfectly untrue.

MR. GLADSTONE: The hon. Member knows that I had to sign these orders, which had been drawn up by my predecessor, and which I found in print.

MR. CLAUDE HAY said that if it were not open to the right hon. Gentleman to exercise his responsibility as a Minister in this matter, how was it that he issued instructions changing the operation of the Aliens Act?

MR. GLADSTONE: I also had to sign the orders under that Act which I found in print, and after they had been working badly for some months I altered one of them.

MR. CLAUDE HAY said the right hon. Gentleman was trying to mix up the Aliens Act with this matter. The present Government had a knack when it suited them of adopting the actions of their predecessors, and refusing to adopt them when it did not suit them. The right hon. Gentleman having signed the document increasing the licence fee allowed the Secretary to the Board of Education to write a letter in which he said that the late Home Secretary was responsible for the Order, and not the present Home Secretary, who signed it. Then there was the question of the Aliens Act. They had no explanation of why the limit in regard to the carrying of immigrants on ships had been raised from twelve to twenty, and it looked as if that action had been taken in order that the Home Secretary might defeat the statute and burden the poor in the East End of London with the keep of human beings who had been refused by every other civilised nation.

Whereupon Mr. GEORGE WHITELEY rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

On the Motion for the adjournment of the House,

*MR. MADDISON (Burnley) drew attention to a case which he said had arisen that day under the Aliens Act. A Russian Jew possessing only £2 10s. had been rejected at Gravesend by the officer. On reaching St. Katharine's Dock, the immigrant told his informant that he was a deserter from the Russian Army. Shortly afterwards, by some means or other, he contrived to escape, and at the time he received this information the man was at large, the police being in search of him. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would make prompt inquiries into the case and cover this unfortunate man with all the protection that could be afforded him. The House would remember that three or four weeks ago an alien immigrant proved to be a deserter from the Russian Army, and it then turned out that he was afraid to tell the truth, as he thought it would mean at once his return to Russia and probably certain death. This man, probably a comrade of the former one, followed the same tactics, with the result that he met the very serious fate of being rejected. He thought it was necessary to bring this matter before the House of Commons at the earliest possible moment, as it seemed a most serious thing to happen under British law. Russia was in a state of revolution, and while he candidly admitted that a large proportion of the refugees from Russia were Socialists with whom he was not in agreement, that made him the more anxious that those who came here for asylum in consequence of religious or political persecution should not be turned back. If there was one thing we prided ourselves upon, it was that this country had been the asylum of the victims of religious or political tyranny.

MR. GLADSTONE said he had no knowledge of the facts of the case, but he would at once make inquiries. If the man did not avail himself of his right of appeal, but escaped, he exposed himself to the penalties of the Act. He would make inquiries and communicate with the hon. Gentleman.

MR. LEIF JONES (Westmoreland, Appleby) thought that the House was placed in a serious position in regard to this man, whom apparently the police were hunting with a view of punishing him. If they caught him he would be brought before a court of summary jurisdiction, convicted as a rogue and vagabond and committed to prison. They were in this position, that a man who stated he was a deserter from the Russian army would be punished in our courts for having escaped from custody because he expected to be sent back to Russia. He thought it should be recognised that every deserter from the Russian army was a political refugee and should be so treated.

THE STRANDING OF THE "ORDOVICIAN.'

*LORD MUSKERRY: My Lords, I rise to ask His Majesty's Government whether, at the recent formal investigation into the stranding of the steamer "Ordovician," the Court declared that at the time of the occurrence a Greek who could speak no English was at the wheel and a Greek who could speak no English was on the look-out, and that bad steering conduced to the disaster; and, if so, whether in view of the circumstances they will quash the suspension of the certificate of the chief officer of the "Ordovician." I hold in my hand the official Report of the formal investigation held at Cardiff into the circumstances attending the stranding and loss of this steamship. The Report of the Court was as follows—

> "The Court, having carefully inquired into the circumstances attending the above-mentioned shipping casualty, finds, for the reasons stated in the Annex hereto, that the stranding and loss of the vessel were caused by bad steering by the foreign seamen and the negligent supervision of the officer of the watch. The Court finds the chief officer, Mr. William John Jones, in default, and suspends his certificate for three months."

With your Lordships' permission I will read one or two extracts from the Annex which will show, I think, in a startling manner the way matters are now carried on on board some of our British merchant ships. It is stated in the Annex that in this vessel there was only one certificated deck officer besides the master, who, therefore, had to take necessary rest when the first mate, who held a master's certificate, was in charge. Your Lordships will therefore see that there was only one officer in addition to the captain in this fairly large vessel. In setting forth what the cause of the stranding was, the Court states—

> "The stranding and loss of the vessel were caused by the bad steering of the two Greek sailors who were at the wheel during the one and a half hours preceding the stranding, and by the negligent supervision by the officer of the watch."

Further on in the Annex it is stated that—

> "The Court is therefore of opinion that the vessel was not navigated with proper and seamanlike care, and that her loss was due, not to any wrongful act or default of the master, but to the bad steering of the Greek A.B.s and the negligent supervision of the chief officer, who is found in default, and his certificate is suspended for three months. It is not within the province of this Court to express an opinion as to the policy, expedience, or necessity of employing foreign seamen on British vessels, nor to institute any comparison between British and foreign seamen. But the Court deems it a duty to direct attention to the fact that this is the third wreck inquiry held here within a month in which the deck hands have been chiefly foreign seamen with no knowledge of the English language.

The Court points out that in the recent "Rowtor" inquiry it was proved that a Spaniard who could neither speak nor understand English was at the wheel when the vessel stranded; and that in the inquiry into the loss of the "Bavaria"—which involved the sacrifice of many lives—the only deck hands that gave evidence were Russians who were entirely ignorant of the English language, and the Court was satisfied that they made a false imputation on the reputation of the master, who had lost his life in trying to save his vessel. And the Court concludes—

> "The only inference within the province of this Court to draw from the above facts is that special and unremitting vigilance and supervision must be exercised by officers when seamen unable to understand or speak English are at the wheel or on the look-out."

If that were carried out it would mean that each vessel carrying seamen who were ignorant of the English language should ship extra officers. It is absolutely impossible to expect one man to do two men's work, or to be in two places at the same time. How is it conceivable that an officer on the look-out could leave the front of the bridge and go back to the man at the wheel and constantly supervise what he is doing? I would point out to your Lordships that the suspension of the certificate of an officer is a much more serious thing than appears at first sight, because, when an officer whose certificate has been suspended goes to seek employment, he is refused another berth. So far as I understand, the unfortunate officer who is punished in this manner has no Court of Appeal, that is to say, there is no Court of experts to whom he can appeal to go over the evidence and judge whether the decision of the formal Court of Inquiry was correct or not. What was the evidence given in this case? Who were the witnesses? The two Greeks were the only witnesses, for they were the only men on deck besides the officer, and they did not understand one word of English. I have very carefully read the Report of the formal investigation into the loss of this ship, and before coming to your Lordships' House I submitted it to a very eminent naval officer, and asked his opinion upon it; and his view was that, judging by the facts set out in the Report, there was no justification for suspending the certificate of the officer in question.

*THE EARL OF GRANARD: My Lords, I must offer my noble friend my sincere congratulations on the able manner in which he has attempted to make a good case out of very indifferent material. If any of your Lordships have read the Report of the proceedings at the Court of Inquiry on the loss of the "Ordovician," I think you will have been struck by the leniency of that Court towards the officer in question. What happened, roughly, was this. The master of the ship went down below at 1.10 o'clock on the morning of the 6th January, having given distinct orders to the officer he left on deck to call him in the event of the ship running into bad weather or into a fog. At 2.15 o'clock of the same morning the vessel ran into a thick fog, and at 2.35 she struck the rocks and was lost. The chief officer took no steps whatever to carry out the orders of the captain. He also failed to notice that the ship had deviated considerably from her course, although this must have been very obvious from the bearings of the lights. The vessel deviated, I think, five miles to the east of her course in an hour and a half. With regard to the finding of the Court, the Court did not find that the seamen's ignorance of the English language had anything to do with the casualty. The loss of the vessel was attributed, not only to bad steering, but also to the negligent supervision of the chief officer. In these circumstances it is quite impossible for the Board of Trade to reverse the decision they have already come to. The Question has been twice put in the House of Commons, and the President of the Board of Trade has on both occasions replied in the negative. I do not think there is anything more to be said on the subject.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Five o'clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven o'clock.

New Battleship at Devonport—Proportion of Dockyard and Contract Works.

MR. J. WILLIAMS BENN (Devonport): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he can state approximately what percentage of the work associated with the building of the proposed battleship in the Royal dockyard at Devonport will be put out to contract; and whether he will issue instructions that, provided the same quality and cheapness of construction can be assured, such parts as stanchions, eye-plates, water-tight doors, block bands, and other fittings shall be produced in the workshops of the Royal dockyards.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) It is estimated that the expenditure on dockyard labour in connection with the building of the proposed new battleship at Devonport will be about 15 per cent. of the total cost. The remaining 85 per cent. represents expenditure on contract work, and includes, not only materials, but guns, gun mountings, armour, propelling machinery, boilers, and auxiliary machinery. As regards the latter part of the Question, the dockyards are not essentially manufacturing establishments, and it is not considered that it will be in the interests of the public service to make any organic change in the practice usually followed in battleship construction. Where, however, it may be expedient, for economic or other reasons, dockyard manufacture is resorted to in preference to obtaining articles by contract.

No Discharges at Devonport Dockyard.

MR. J. WILLIAMS BENN: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty how far Devonport will be affected by the new list of discharges still regarded as necessary in consequence of the new Naval policy; and whether, in view of what Devonport has already suffered in this regard, he will favourably consider its claim to be exempt from a further diminution of its dockyard population.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) It is not intended to make any further discharges at Devonport during the coming financial year. This does not, of course, apply to temporary entries.

Avocations of William Ellis, of Toomebridge.

MR. McKEAN (Monaghan, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that William Ellis, senior, Toomebridge, holds the positions of postmaster and petty sessions clerk for that district; is agent for the Toome and Vulrea eel fishery; is sub-agent for Mrs. Jones's Moneyglass estate, and has been land agent for Lady Spencer's Castledawson estate for the past four years; and whether he will consider the advisability of preventing a public official from holding such a variety of positions, the duties of which must occasionally conflict with one another.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The registrar of petty sessions clerks informs me that Mr. Ellis, the petty sessions clerk at Toomebridge, is also the sub-postmaster of that place, is one of the lessees of the Toomebridge eel fishery, and is sub-agent and agent respectively for the two estates mentioned. The clerk is not precluded, either by Statute or by Order of the Lord-Lieutenant, from holding any of these positions.

Mr. Ellis performs his duties as petty sessions clerk to the satisfaction of the registrar, and no complaints against him have been received. The petty sessions at Toomebridge are held but once a month, and the clerk's salary is proportionate to the limited extent of the duties to be performed.

MR. J. WILLIAMS BENN: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether he is aware that the labourers in the Royal Naval Hospital work more hours than the labourers in the Royal dockyards; and whether he will consider the advisability of making the working day and advantages which obtain in the dockyard the rule for the Naval Hospital.

Report of Committee on Naval Domestics.

MR. J. WILLIAMS BENN: To ask the Seceretary to the Admiralty when he will be able to furnish the House with the Report of the Admiralty Committee, appointed in January 1905, to consider the question of the status and emoluments of the naval domestics.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The Committee referred to was a departmental committee, and the Report is now under consideration. It is not proposed to publish it.

MR. RIDSDALE (Brighton): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty on what grounds it has been decided to abandon the construction of one of the four armoured cruisers provided for in the Navy Estimates of 1905-6, and authorised by Parliament.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The fourth armoured cruiser in 1905-6 was not proceeded with, as a careful scrutiny of the progress of warship building in other countries, and the existing strength of foreign navies, proved it to be unnecessary to proceed with this vessel when the time arrived, late in the year, for giving the orders for the new ships to be laid down.

Lymph used at National Vaccine Establishment.

MR. J. WILLIAMS BENN: To ask the President of the Local Government Board whether in any instance lymph has been used at the national vaccine establishment which has been derived from the artificial inoculation of calves with smallpox and its subsequent cultivation on a series of calves.

(Answered by Mr. John Burns.) The usual method of obtaining lymph for use at the national vaccine establishment is by vaccinating calves with vaccine lymph obtained from children. Occasionally, however, the lmyph has been procured from abroad, and it is possible that in some instance of this kind the lymph may have been originally derived from artificial inoculation of calves with smallpox, but in no case is lymph used at the establishment unless it has been passed through a series of calves.

Sheep Dipping in Lanarkshire.

MR. MENZIES (Lanarkshire, S.): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether he will consent to alter the date of the second sheep-dipping in the upper, or southern, ward of Lanarkshire from 1st August to 1st July, as arranged for in Section 15, Sub-section 2, of The Sheep Dipping (Scotland) Order, 1905.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) We have received representations on this subject, which are now under consideration. I hope it may be found practicable to meet special cases in which, owing to the local practice as regards dipping, the Order as it stands would entail the re-dipping of sheep already dipped under proper safeguards in July.

LAND VALUES TAXATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Order for Second Reading, read.

MR. SUTHERLAND (Elgin Burghs) said that in moving the Second Reading of the Land Values Taxation (Scotland) Bill he craved the indulgence and forbearance of the House. The title of the Bill had been considerably altered from that which had been originally presented to the House. That arose in this way. He had intended to include counties within the scope of the Bill, and also to empower local authorities to acquire compulsorily land at a fair value for public purposes. But, after consideration, it was thought that the embodiment of such clauses would over-burden the Bill, while it was also stated that some of them might be incompetent; therefore he had limited this Bill to what was known as the Glasgow Bill. By doing so they could get a straight issue on which to debate the principle of the taxation of land values. The principle of the Bill had been supported by no fewer than 550 municipalities, by the Prime Minister in his recent speech in the Albert Hall, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and by the Lord-Advocate for Scotland. Here he might be allowed to say that, as a Scotsman, he tendered his sincere congratulations to the right hon. Gentleman on his appointment to the distinguished position of Lord-Advocate, and on his making his first appearance in a Scottish debate; and he expressed the hope that the right hon. Gentleman would have a brilliant career in his new office. This House had affirmed the principle of this measure in the last Parliament by a majority of twenty. Without wishing to be offensive he might be permitted to say that in this reformed House of Commons there would be a much greater majority in favour of the Bill than on the last occasion on which it was presented to the House. Roughly speaking, the Bill provided for the separate valuation of sites and for the imposition of a rate not exceeding 2s. per £1 on site values. Clause 7 provided for the taxation of feu duties by the method of granting a right of relief to the person liable in payment of the feu duty against the person entitled to receive payment. That seemed to him to form the main scope of the Bill. He did not presume to think in asking the House to assent to the Second Reading of this Bill that every hon. Member would agree with every detail in it, but he hoped that they would agree with its main principle—which was the taxation of land values. It met the needs of municipalities—needs not created by extravagance, but imposed upon them by the growing necessities of the case; by the rise in the standard of comfort and civilisation which had increased, was increasing, and was likely to increase—by discovering new sources of revenue. To many municipal corporations it appeared that no more fitting subject of taxation could be found than the property which derived so much of its value from municipal expenditure. They knew that in the past expenditure had generally proceeded along the line of land tenure. Not to go too far back, they were aware that a tax of 4s. in the £ was imposed on the land in order to maintain the functions of government. However, it had come to pass that the landowner had slipped out of his obligation, and had transferred that burden to the shoulders of others. He maintained that there was a fundamental distinction between the site of a house and the structure. The house depreciated in value unless expenditure was incurred in keeping it in a state of repair; but the site remained, and it appreciated in value by the presence and the expenditure of the community. When rents increased it was not because the value of the building had increased, but because the value of the site had increased. It was locality, therefore, which gave the site its value. If a man had his house burned down it took him no more to rebuild it than it did to build the original house. Now he held that one of the effects of this Bill, if put into operation, would be to kill land speculation. In New South Wales, by the imposition of a two-shilling tax on the annual rent of land values, land speculation had been killed. At the present moment vacant land in this country contributed practically little or nothing in taxation to the community. Take the case of a man who bought two pieces of land each of the same value. On the one buildings were erected, and the other he left vacant. On the first he paid taxes, on the second he paid nothing; but the value of the second was continually being increased by the expenditure of his neighbours and of the municipal corporation. That was a tax on industry. The more a man did to make his house valuable, the more he had to pay for his energy and enterprise in upholding the machinery of municipal government; while the man who held up his land got off scot-free. And then, when the owner of the vacant land let it out in feu, he took the law into his own hand and contracted himself out of all liability by saying that the feuar should pay all the taxation on the property. A great deal had been said about the unearned increment. It was not right to say that it was unearned; it was unearned as far as the landlord was concerned, but not as far as the community was concerned. Some who were in favour of the principle of this Bill thought that the whole amount of what was called the unearned increment ought to go to the benefit of the local rates, that was to say that the whole unearned increment should be appropriated by the community. That was not the case with the present Bill. The Bill merely proposed that a rate not exceeding two shillings in the pound should be levied in addition to the ordinary rates on the holder of the land. Take a case in point. When the municipality of Portobello proposed to expend a certain amount of money in public improvement, rents in the neighbourhood were increased by £5,000. It seemed to him and those who agreed with him, that the consumer of land values, who in the case mentioned was the owner of the land, ought to pay his fair share of taxation. The hon. Member for Holborn had given notice of an Amendment to the Second Reading of the Bill setting forth that a satisfactory reform of the present system of local taxation must be arrived at, not by piecemeal and partial treatment, but by such legislation as would secure fair and equitable results to all classes of the community. The position taken up by the hon. Member for Holborn reminded him of the remark of the late President Lincoln, that he generally found that the man who protested that he would shed the last drop of his blood in defence of his country was amazingly particular about the first drop. It had been pointed out that there was an inequitable distribution of taxation on personal and heritable property. That question did not come within the scope of the measure now under consideration; but he had no doubt that if the hon. Gentleman who brought that matter before the House of Commons last year introduced a Bill on the subject, those on the Ministerial side of the House would be found willing to support it. It was pointed out that there were other things besides land which got the benefit of the expenditure of the community, such as gas-works, water-works, and tramways. In the first place most of those were already municipalised, and rightly so. They occupied a totally different position from the land. Where those enterprises were not municipalised, so soon as exorbitant charges were imposed so soon was there competition. That could not be the case in regard to land. It had been argued by an hon. Member that it might be for the ultimate good of the community if a vacant site was kept back from occupation for twenty or thirty years—that the community would then reap an immense benefit. It was easy to reduce that argument to an absurdity and say that it would be still better if the land was kept back from occupation for 200 or 300 years. Again, it had been argued that to put a tax on unoccupied land would not cheapen sites for workmen's houses. But, he insisted, experience went quite contrary to that argument; it had been proved that by putting a tax on unoccupied land a great deal of it must necessarily come into the market by easy and natural stages. If that was not the case, it was useless on the part of hon. Gentleman opposite to oppose this measure. Another question dealt with by the Bill was the very important one of the taxation of feu duties. He held very emphatically that feu duties acquired their value from the presence of the community, and so ought in justice to contribute to the burdens of the community. They depended for their existence on the continuance of the community, and without the community the ground would not be worth the feu duty. The ground was not the security for the feu duty; it required also the house that might be built upon it to make it of value. The feu duty was not the interest on a mortgage with the land as security any more than rent was the interest on a bond with the house as security. In the case of interest on mortgages the subject of the mortgage might be redeemed. It was not so in the case of a feu duty or house property. By stress of circumstances there might be a chance of purchasing the feu duty, but there was no inherent right to do so. Feu duty was undoubtedly rent, and as such ought to bear its fair share of the burdens which other rents had to bear.

It was argued that the clause should not have a retrospective effect. There might be a legitimate difference of opinion with regard to that, but it was a matter, he should say, for discussion in Committee. All he asked the House now to do was to assent to the principle of the Bill. Coming to the question of contract between the landlord and feuar, he would ask whether the parties to the contract were free agents. All monopolies were bad, but surely there was no kind of monopoly worse than land monopoly. Did the landlord and feuar meet on equal terms? If they did, then let them assume that the feu duty was rent. In that case the feuar was asked in many cases to pay from 50 per cent. to 100 per cent. more than the usual rent. They knew the fate of those who went into courts of law to try and get interest at that rate. How was it that when a contract was entered into, the proprietor always managed to contract himself out of all obligations with reference to local rates, and that the whole burden had to be borne by the feuar? Surely no one would tell him that there was freedom of contract there. It was stated that there would be a violent interference with existing contracts by making the clause have a retrospective effect. He would, however, point to the crofters' legislation, and to the whole trend of Irish legislation on the land question, which had been so amply justified by experience. Surely the words of the Prime Minister, speaking in 1903 in the House, meant that in his opinion existing contracts were not altogether so safe and sacrosanct as was represented. He had heard one or two gentlemen deride the idea that there was no freedom of contract between the superior and the feuar. At the present moment the north-east of Scotland was greatly excited, because one of its public boards wanted a bit of land on which to build a school, and the condition laid down was that unless the building was reserved for all time for that purpose, no matter what legislation might ensue, the land would not be granted. Yet they talked of freedom of contract. Everyone knew that towns were not allowed to extend in the direction wanted, because of the difficulty of acquiring land on reasonable terms. One of the land associations of the north of Scotland was protesting against the passing of the measure. A few years ago the Corporation of Aberdeen erected a bridge across the Dee, where that association had 180 acres of land. The corporation erected a bridge giving access to that particular ground, and enabling it to be feued by the land association. The bridge cost somewhere about £25,000, the land associations contributed merely £3,000 or £4,000; and yet, when the Harbour Commissioners of Aberdeen wanted to purchase 8½ acres of the land, which had been made so valuable by the erection of the bridge, they were charged no less than £56,000, although the annual rental on the valuation roll was only £444. The same commissioners had to get 4¾ acres of ground adjacent, belonging to another landlord, and they were mulcted in a sum of £29,900, although the rental on the valuation roll was only £32 10s. 0d. If they did not go in for the principle of the taxation of land values, he put it to the House whether they should not have something like municipal death duties. Those men who reaped so much out of the energy and expenditure of the community should be made to return a fair proportion to the community. He understood that his hon. friend the Member for Preston was to propose an Amendment to the Motion for the Second Reading of this Bill. The name of his hon. friend was associated in the public mind with the powerful advocacy of Cobdenite principles. What was it that Cobden said with regard to the land laws? He said—

> "I warn Ministers, I warn landowners and the aristocracy of this country against forcing upon the attention of the middle and industrious classes the subject of taxation. For great as I consider the grievance of the protective system, mighty as I consider the fraud and injustice of the Corn Laws, I verily believe that if you were to bring forward the history of taxation in this country for the last one hundred and fifty years you would find as black a record against the landowners as even the Corn Law itself."

He did not say that this Bill would redress all the grievances which Mr. Cobden had in his mind, but he believed it was a step in that direction. He believed the Bill would have a marked effect upon that class of men who did so much against the best interests of the country, that class known as the slum landlords. The people of Ireland had been working out their own solution of their land question; they in Scotland might not have their wit, eloquence, and imagination, but they were as fully alive to the evils of their land system and were as fully determined that they should be grappled with. It would not do that on this question the minimum of performance should follow the maximum of promise. He appealed to the House to assent to the principle of the Bill by giving it its Second Reading and so to do some measure of justice to the populations of their great towns. He was certain that the Government would be no party to disregarding the authoritative voice of the 550 municipalities which advocated the passing of the measure. He begged to move.

MR. LAIDLAW (Renfrewshire, E.) said he had two reasons for seconding the Motion. The first was that his predecessor in the representation of East Renfrew moved the Second Reading last session, and the second was that his constituents were very deeply interested in the matter because it closely touched their relations in and with the city of Glasgow. In the debate which took place last session the Corporation of Glasgow was twitted with not being able to find a representative of its own to plead its cause in this House. True at that time Glasgow was misrepresented and not represented; its then representatives were largely concerned in the landed interest; to-day they represented the people. Last year the Bill was opposed by hon. Members to whom the status quo was everything; those Gentlemen were no longer Members of the House, and not a single Scottish representative who took an active part in opposing last year's Bill had secured re-election to Parliament. He did not intend to discuss the details of this intricate question. Others who would follow—life long students of the subject—were much more able to do so than he; but he yielded to none in his profound conviction as to the need for such a measure as the Bill under discussion. He was strongly fortified in that conviction by the fact that the Town Council of Glasgow, one of the best governed cities in the Empire, was almost to a man in favour of it, and that there were no less than 550 municipalities in Great Britain and Ireland supporting the Bill. Further, at least sixty of the seventy-two hon. Members who now represented Scotland were in favour of it. The people of Scotland (except the happy possessors of the land) were for it. A Royal Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes in 1885, reported in favour of a measure of this kind, and lastly a Tory Government last session allowed this very Bill to pass its Second Reading. He approached this question from a tenants' standpoint, and as one who held that all men had equal rights in the land. What was this measure designed to effect? Broadly, it was to prevent the squeezing of the poor man by the land monopolist. He supported the Bill for two reasons—firstly, because it would give labour and industry a more just share of their own earnings, and secondly, it would bring idle land into the market, especially in the belt on which all our great cities must expand. Most hon. Members had heard of the Old Scotch Pumps. These pumps were placed for the refreshment of weary travellers, who, however, were put to very great exertions in the effort to obtain a refreshing drink. The expenditure of a great deal of labour produced very small results, so far as the traveller himself was concerned, and the secret was that the pumps were so arranged that for every drop of water he drew for himself, a gallon went up to the big house on the hill. This aptly illustrated the position of most of their great industries as well as the position of every labouring man who rented a cottage or a tenement throughout Scotland. Their present system of putting all the burdens on the buildings bore hard on all classes, and hardest of all on the poorest, for the man with the smallest income paid most relatively for rent and rates. It pressed on labour, skilled and unskilled. It pressed on industry, trade, and commerce, and even science and art did not escape the pressure. The rent of the meanest cottage and the rent of the workshop were at once advanced, and the workman was hit twice—aye, hit three times. The landlord took more rent, the collector demanded more rates, and the employer gave smaller wages, because, his rent and rates being higher, he could not pay more. The shop, the warehouse, the merchant's office, the professional man's rent all went up because the owner of the land on which they lived and worked took advantage of their natural wish—their necessity in many cases—to remain where they were, and where they had, by years of toil, created for themselves comfortable homes and good surroundings, when they had provided themselves at great expense with good sanitation, a pure water supply, well lit streets, and much else that went to make life, even in great cities, worth living. No sooner had this been done than a gentleman of unlimited leisure swooped down and demanded in the shape of increased ground rent nine-tenths of the fruits of all their efforts. It was said that seventy men owned one half of Scotland. Half-a-dozen of them held most of the golden zone which surrounded the city of Glasgow. They were good men in their ways. He did not blame them for taking the best price they could get for their land or for holding it back when they saw a prospect of doing better five or ten years hence. He did the same himself when he had anything of value to sell. They did not blame the men; they blamed the system and they wanted to alter it. Land fetching £2 per acre for the grazing of cattle fetched £40 to £200 when wanted for the shelter of men, and anything up to £500,000 when the buyer was cornered. The present Lord Advocate, in supporting this Bill last session, quoted instances in Scotland where eighty-six, 136, and 435 years' purchase had had to be paid to private individuals for land in Scotland when wanted for public purposes. A Bill like this in force would create such competition amongst sellers as would save the State from having to pay such exorbitant rates. He would like to quote one or two concrete cases from Glasgow. When the Cathcart School Board wanted the use of land to erect a public school, the price rose from £2 10s. per acre per annum to £100 per acre per annum. The Glasgow Social Union, who resolved to build houses for the working classes, had to pay for the ground they occupied at the rate of £4,440 per acre or over £200 per acre per annum, while the Corporation paid £43,500 for 43½ acres between the River Clyde and Rutherglen Road, as an addition to the Glasgow Green—£1,000 per acre. £43,500 for permission to convert a swamp into a recreation ground! The Corporation, over a hundred years ago, sold the site upon which the Glasgow municipal buildings stand for 2s. 8d. per square yard, or some £800 in all. When the Corporation bought this same site back, some twenty years ago, they had to pay £175,000—equal to £35 16s. per square yard. There were other instances he might cite, but surely these were sufficient. What was proposed by this Bill was not an untried experiment. In New Zealand no fewer than sixty rating districts had adopted the taxation of land values for local purposes, with the most beneficent results, and he could quote the testimony of competent authorities on that point. In New South Wales, in Queensland, in South Australia, in New York, in Canada, and in Japan steps were being or had been taken in the same direction. He would briefly refer to some of the objections that had been urged against the Bill. The House was told last session that the landowners before they were able to feu were obliged to lay out large sums of money in the preparation of plans for houses, in roadways, on drainage, and in other ways. He had made careful inquiries and he found that this was very far from being the case anywhere in Scotland. There might be occasional instances where that was done, but it was only in cases where the landlord found that he had a prospect of getting back a pound for the shilling he laid out. The second argument constantly urged was the widows' and orphans' argument. They were told it would be very hard on those who had invested their small savings in ground rents. But a measure of this kind would benefit a hundred widows for every one it would injure, because they would be as eager as anyone else to have their rates reduced. With regard to trust funds invested the persons interested would suffer no greater injury than holders of Consols suffered when Mr. Goschen reduced the interest from 3 to 2½ per cent. He would not attempt to answer all the arguments constantly urged against this measure, because that could be better done by those who would follow him. It was sometimes said that if a new source of revenue was put within the reach of a municipality it would greatly encourage them in extravagance. It would encourage them in useful enterprises, in the cheapening of trams to the country, the pulling down of old slums and the making of open air spaces, and should they be tempted to use this source of income for wasteful purposes, a chord of public opinion would be struck which would not fail to be vocal. It was not intended to increase the revenue. What was put upon the land would be taken off improvements. In 1850 the gross rental of Glasgow was £1,017,362. In 1890 it was £4,952,960, an increase of £78,000 per annum, or 386 per cent. in fifty years. What the promoters of this Bill desired, what they were aiming at, was to make it possible for a workman to have a better house for £8 a year than he was now able to get for £16. They wanted him to have it where his wife and children could have fresh air and decent surroundings, instead of in the slums, where the owners of the land would not keep their horses or dogs. Intemperance was said to be the chief cause of this condition of affairs. It was no doubt one of the causes, but the cruel wrong arising from the fact that our people were shut out from the land fell alike upon the just and the unjust. We had now cheap transit in the large cities, and if land could be obtained at a moderate price the condition of affairs would be speedily altered. Men were holding the land with an iron grip, and it must be the object of Parliament to slacken that grip. They wanted to make it as unprofitable to keep idle land as it was to keep an idle horse. He did not object to a man having two or three millions a year—what would some of our charities do without them?—nor did he mind men having large incomes so long as they were honestly earned by the exercise of superior strength or skill, but he did object to accumulations of great wealth at one end of the scale which entailed accumulations of misery and wretchedness at the other. If we had unemployed at the top we must have unemployed at the bottom. If there were fewer millionaires we would be troubled with fewer subscription lists. He appealed to the House not to reject this measure. It was, he thought, needless to make any appeal to the Prime Minister, who had both inside and outside the House expressed himself strongly in favour of the principle of this Bill. No doubt the Bill would also have the effective support of the Lord Advocate. He appealed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, because if this Bill appealed to any one it should be the Chancellor of the Exchequer. All they asked was that he would show his gratitude to them for unearthing a new source of revenue—a new gold mine. They only desired to take the crust for local purposes. The deep hidden deposits they left him to extract at his leisure and they would ask no questions. The Bill secured the valuation of land apart from improvements, and it would enable the Chancellor of the Exchequer to estimate how much could be secured for the national purse at any given rate from this source. Might they suggest this as a first step in the readjustment of taxation which was so emphatically demanded by the country at the recent general election. He need not appeal to hon. Members on the Ministerial side of the House, as he believed that nine-tenths of them were pledged to the principle embodied in this Bill, and he might say the same of the hon. Members who sat on the front Benches below the gangway on the opposite side. Were it necessary to make an appeal to their Irish friends for support, he would do so on the plea that in a domestic matter of this kind Scotland should have her own way. He hoped that the time was not far distant when it would not be necessary for Scotland to trouble the Imperial Parliament with the results that follow the working of their own pump handles, and when they would be allowed to manage all purely domestic matters in their own way for themselves. He was sure that he would not appeal to their friends in vain when he reminded them that this Bill related to Scotland alone, and that at least sixty of the seventy-two Scottish Members of this House ardently desired the passing of this measure. With all deference he made an appeal to the Party opposite, the Party that was supposed to represent the landed interests in this House, but who never failed—when gently driven—to consider the poor. He had great hopes that the majority even on that side would support this measure. If any small remnant remained to whom further appeal was needed, he would remind them of their own often repeated prayer—"laying aside all personal interests and prejudices," let him appeal to them to answer their own prayers. In conclusion he would say that in the first half of the last century two barbed wire fences stood between our people and a condition of comfort and happiness. Richard Cobden smashed the fence which surrounded our shores. The clumsy attempt which had been made to re-erect that fence had brought together a force which would demolish the other, and enable us to take another great step in advance, by giving the people free access to the land, and bringing happiness and content to the people of this country.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time.—(Mr. Sutherland.)

*MR. HAROLD COX (Preston) said he rose to move the rejection of this Bill, and he felt sure that his intervention would not be resented. It was true that this Bill applied to Scotland only, but he thought everyone who was in favour of the Bill looked upon it, not merely as a measure for Scotland, but as a measure which they hoped to extend to the whole of the United Kingdom. Therefore, Englishmen were justified in sallying forth to resist the attack. He believed that the Bill was based upon a fundamental delusion. He recognised fully the sincerity of those who supported it and were convinced of its value, but he believed they had been led away by delusive arguments into supporting what was not a reform but an obstacle to reform. At the back of the Bill was really the name of Henry George. He was the author of the whole delusion. About twenty-five years ago he startled the country by professing to teach a new gospel, which was really only a réchauffé of the doctrine of the French physiocrats of the eighteenth century that nothing was to be taxed except land. The object Henry George had in view was to get rid of private property in land. That was also the object of the originators of this Bill. Members had all received a circular issued by a gentleman who had led this agitation in Scotland. There were many mistakes of fact in that circular. The author said that a land tax was imposed by William the Third, and out of that land tax landowners had ever since been trying to escape. If he had read history more carefully he would have known that this tax was not a land tax but an income tax, and with further investigation he would have discovered that it was to-day actually charged on houses as well as land. The point in the circular to which he (Mr. Harold Cox) specially referred was the remark—

> "The fundamental principle upon which this Bill rests is that land is not and cannot become private property."

He would like to know whether the Government accepted that definition of the Bill. He doubted whether the Lord Advocate accepted it, and he did not believe that the Government was going to risk its reputation and the reputation of the whole of the Liberal Party by conducting a campaign against private property in land. He hoped the Lord Advocate would treat it rather as a modest measure for the reform of local taxation. If that were so then the measure could be argued on the assumption that private property in land was to be permitted to continue. How did land differ from other property in such a way as to justify this proposal? There had been a good deal of exaggeration as to the relative importance of land. Centuries ago, no doubt, land was of supreme importance when food was obtained by hunting wild animals, and then every man wanted many square miles for himself in order to get a meal. When they reached the pastoral stage of civilisation, the individual man could do with fewer square miles; in the agricultural stage still less land sufficed, and now that the manufacturing stage was reached men could do with very little land indeed per head. His point was that as civilisation advanced so the relative importance of land declined and the relative importance of capital increased. To bring the question home in a concrete manner, supposing an operative who had spent the greater part of his life in a particular industry were thrown out of work, what would it profit him if he were offered land which no farmer would take? What, too, was the use of land without capital to work it? One of the few Liberals who was defeated in the last election told him that very near the centre of a village in a Yorkshire valley there was a plot of land used for growing potatoes. The grasping landowner wished to put up the rent but the villagers would not hear of it. The rent of the land was threepence a year and the grasping landowner wanted another penny. He wished there were more pieces of land like that. Hon. Members cheered, but if they filled up a little island with human beings they could not expect the rent of land to remain low. Again, they were told that land was a monopoly. It was not true. The monopoly was in a particular piece of land, just as a particular pair of trousers belonging to a man was a monopoly. [An HON. MEMBER: You can make more trousers.] Yes, and there were other pieces of land. [An HON. MEMBER: You cannot make more land.] No, but there was more land ready made. [An HON. MEMBER: But you don't make it.] If one owner did not wish to sell there were others who wished to do so. Taking England and Wales alone he found that there were well over 1,000,000 separate landowners, and yet people said there was a monopoly of land. A large number of landowners every day were trying to sell their land and were unable to find purchasers. It was said that there were occasions where a particular piece of land was wanted to benefit the community. Of course there were, but surely when such cases arose it was the duty of the community to buy that piece of land at a fair price. If a community wanted something for its benefit it had no right to take it at the expense of a particular individual. What ought to be done was to enlarge the powers of local authorities so that they could buy land with less difficulty than at present. But the Bill did not do this. All the Bill did was to impose a tax with the object of forcing people to sell what they were reluctant to sell. He could imagine nothing more unjust than that a man who by his savings had purchased a piece of land should be taxed in order to compel him to sell it at a lower price to someone else. That was what was being proposed by this Bill. What had they been protesting against for the last two years? They had been protesting against the proposal that the State should interfere on behalf of the seller to make things dearer for the buyer. It was equally unjust for the State to interfere on behalf of the buyer to make things cheaper for him at the expense of the seller. That was not free trade. It was an inverted form of protection. If they once started on that process where would they stop? They might apply this doctrine of selling things cheap to labour in South Africa. Did hon. Gentlemen approve of the poll tax on natives to compel them to sell their labour cheap? He was told that this Bill was necessary because land was held back. Was labour never held back? Had they never heard of a strike? If they accepted the principle of this Bill it would be equally just to put a heavy tax on every man who was striking. Take the case of dealing with futures in wheat or iron. That was occurring every day. The business of a man whose machinery was perfect, whose employees were working sympathetically with him, and whose whole industry was well managed, might be brought suddenly to a standstill because somebody was holding up the raw material which he wanted for his work. Such an incident as that might cause widespread misery throughout the whole of a great industry. It might be the result of a ring extending all over the world, but in land there never was a ring. There was never such a thing as a ring of land in this country. There were local cases, of course; but surely there was a very great difference between the local injury caused by one or two landlords refusing to sell in a locality and the widespread injury that might be caused by holding back wheat or iron. [An HON. MEMBER: It is a question of degree.] That was his point. The promoters of the Bill were dealing with a trumpery matter. Cheap capital was much more important than cheap land from another aspect. It was more important for industrial development. Everybody knew that when money was cheap manufacturers were more likely to launch out, and their competition tended to increase the wages of the working-classes. He passed to a question upon which the greatest stress had always been laid, and that was the housing question. They had been told again and again that if they were to tax land values they would solve the housing problem. In his opinion it would act in entirely the contrary direction. In order to build houses they wanted not only a site, but capital to build with. He had got out the figures of some housing schemes, and those he would quote were not selected figures. He would take for example the case of a housing scheme near London where the land cost £400 per acre, and the construction of the roads and sewers cost another £400. Seventeen houses per acre had been built on that land costing £300 apiece. Taking interest at 5 per cent.

they would find that the total annual cost of the scheme worked out at £17 7s. per house. The cost of the site of each house was £1 3s. 6d. Therefore, supposing they got the land absolutely for nothing the whole saving would be 23s. 6d. upon each house. On the other hand, supposing they had their capital cheaper by one per cent. they would effect a saving of £3 9s. 5d. He could give numerous instances in other places where the saving by reducing the interest on capital by 1 per cent. would be two or three times greater than if the land was obtained for nothing. So that it was clear they would not solve the housing problem if they got their land for nothing. He was doing his best with others to promote a housing scheme for rural districts, but at present it was hung up because they had not the necessary capital, and if any of those who were so anxious to tax land values would only lend them the money at 3 per cent. they could go ahead. He had been asked how he would make capital cheaper. He had no sovereign remedy except to avoid the blunders which made capital dear. They could not have the luxury of a war without paying for it. The money that ought to have been spent in building houses for the working classes had been blown away in South Africa, and they would never get it back again; neither would they get back to the economic position they were in before the war except by steady work and careful saving. There was another way in which the taxation of ground values affected the housing question. Anyone familiar with the practical working of the building trade would know that it was the habit of builders to raise money upon ground rents. By doing that they were able to get their capital cheaper, and why? Because ground rents were a trustee investment, and as there was a large area of supply they got capital at a lower rate. If they adopted the principle of this Bill or the proposals of the hon. Member for the Elland Division, they would subject ground rents to all the uncertainties of local taxation, and they would cease to be a subject of trustee investment because of the uncertainty, and the price builders would have to pay for capital would rise. His next point was that of the unearned increment. The hon. Member for Renfrew gave some awful cases from Glasgow, and he could give some awful cases in London and elsewhere, but he thought the Lord Advocate would admit that hard cases would make bad law. But was it only land that got unearned increment? Had they never heard of the unearned increment on the Stock Exchange and of the millions made there by buying cheap and selling dear? There was this great difference between Stock Exchange securities and land, that although they could rig the market on the Stock Exchange by false rumours and lying telegrams, they could not rig the market in land. They had been told that although Stock Exchange values fluctuated up and down, land always rose in value. He would ask those who really believed that to put their money on their creed and go into the market and purchase land. If the tendency of land was to always rise in value why did they waste money in their own business or in buying Stock Exchange shares? But, after all what relevance had the unearned increment to this Bill, which did not deal with it at all? If they were in earnest about taxing the unearned increment, they would make a valuation of the whole country, and provide that in future the unearned increment should be taxed or confiscated, but this measure did not do that. This Bill taxed at an equal pound rate land whether it had fallen or risen in value, and it was therefore irrelevant to use arguments about the unearned increment in connection with these proposals. This Bill imposed a special tax upon persons who owned land. He laid stress upon the word persons because people imagined that they were taxing the land itself. Land did not pay taxation; persons paid taxes, and all this talk about land being made for man came to this, that they intended to put a penal tax upon a specially selected class of the community, which class already paid 1s. in the £. income-tax and who would be called upon to pay an additional income-tax of 2s. in the £. He would ask how would hon. Members deal with the case he would now put before them which would inevitably come up not once but a hundred times. Supposing a workman saved money and bought his house, and another workman, instead of buying a house, put his savings into the savings bank. Under this Bill they were proposing to tax one at the rate of 2s. in the £. and the other nothing at all. He had never yet received an answer to that question. Again, suppose a man had two daughters and he left to one £20 a year in ground rents and to the other £20 a year in Consols. The girl with Consols paid nothing, but the girl with £20 in ground rents would have to pay £2 a year. It was all very well to use metaphysical arguments about land, but there was something far more important, and that was to maintain justice between individuals, and until the right hon. Gentleman was able to tell them where the justice lay in picking out one individual for a penal tax and leaving another individual untaxed, he thought they were justified in voting against this Bill. Last year the Lord Advocate partly suggested that Clause 7 of this Bill was largely a matter of detail, but he could hardly believe that that was his real view. That Clause provided that existing contracts should be torn up as far as this Bill was concerned. Surely the right hon. Gentleman would not hold that the fulfilment of a contract was a matter of detail. Surely a Government which had maintained the sanctity of contracts in South Africa, even though they were virtually contracts of slavery, would not destroy the sanctity of contracts in order to shift the burden of rates and taxes in Scotland? Yet if they rejected this clause the whole agitation would tumble to pieces.

MR. TREVELYAN: No, no.

*MR. HAROLD COX said he knew the hon. Member for the Elland Division would not agree with him, but he was referring to the Scottish agitation. He had watched the opinions expressed in the Scotch papers on this subject, and the impression was that as soon as they knocked out Clause 7 the Bill would disappear. The aim of this measure was to get at the great landowners, but if they left out Clause 7 the landowner disappeared, and they would be left face to face with the ordinary ratepayer, who would have to pay this burden and would be called upon to pay two taxes instead of one. It was a great mistake to assume that only great landowners were involved. The Prudential Insurance Company had £4,000,000 invested in ground rents, and £6,000,000 on mortgage, together with other land investments, making a total of £13,000,000 in land out of total assets of £51,000,000. Those were the kind of people who would be hit by this Clause, as well as every working man who had bought his own house. And who would be benefited? This Bill would benefit people like the Beits and Barnatos, and shareholders in great industrial concerns paying 30 per cent. dividends. Those were the people whom it was proposed to benefit at the expense of working men who had bought their own houses. This was essentially a capitalists' movement. [Cries of "No, no."] It was very significant that some of the most prominent supporters of this movement were among the most prominent capitalists in the country. They would obtain an advantage, because their taxation would be reduced by virtue of the penal taxation imposed on landowners. People talked about getting access to the land. What did it mean? It meant that they would compel various landlords at present to sell land cheap. Would the people generally be benefited by that? No. The people who had made their money on the Stock Exchange would benefit. This Bill would merely transfer the land from the old landowners to the new capitalists. He came now to the Minority Report of the Royal Commission. The Lord Advocate last year based his case largely on that Report. He should like to know whether the hon. and learned Gentleman accepted the whole of that Report, or whether, in quoting the Report, he felt justified in taking out pieces to suit his argument and rejecting the rest. What the Royal Commission proposed was something absolutely and totally different from this Bill. It condemned Bills of this character, and it proposed instead a small tax on land which must be strictly limited by Act of Parliament, and which must be accompanied by a large Imperial subsidy. The two things were to go hand in hand, and the small tax on land values was only declared to be just because of the large Imperial subsidy. Was that the view which the Lord Advocate accepted? It was utterly unfair to quote in support of such a measure as this the Report of the Royal Commission. It was equally unfair to quote the case of New Zealand, for in that country there was a land-tax which was a substitute for the income-tax. Did hon. Members propose that their land-tax should be a substitute for the income-tax? They proposed it as an addition to the income-tax. The proposal here was to pick out the owners of land and saddle them with a double share of taxation. In favour of the Bill it was argued that it would shift the burden of taxation from the suburbs to the centre. That sounded very nice for the people living in the suburbs, but what about the struggling ratepayers who were doing their best to make a living in the centre? Where was the justice of relieving somebody in the suburbs at the expense of somebody in the centre? It would have the inevitable effect of destroying open spaces. [Cries of "No."] Unless they exempted all open spaces the Bill certainly would lead to their sale for building. In regard to unoccupied land it was asked why it should not be taxed. It was because it was yielding no revenue. Like the Royal Commission, he saw no objection to a small tax on unoccupied land. It must be very small, or it would be unfair. If a man had no revenue from what he owned it was contrary to our system of taxation to put a tax on it. The Royal Commission, in the final words of their report, said—

> "This proposal would conduce to the removal of some of the widely spread misconceptions which seem to prevail, not only in political circles, but among economic authorities and responsible statesmen; for . . . . it would show that there is no large undeveloped source of taxation available for local purposes, and still less for national purposes."

That was the verdict of the minority of the Royal Commission which the supporters of this Measure were so fond of quoting. It was because of that verdict he began his speech by saying that this agitation blocked the way of real reform. They were asked to pass the Bill in order to remove widespread misconceptions from the minds of responsible statesmen. It was better that their statesmen should think out the question and remove these misconceptions themselves. The Bill which the Royal Commission recommended was the maximum they would ever get from any Government. Was it worth getting? Was it worth while wasting their efforts on such a trumpery measure as this? There were many defects in the present rating system which needed reform, and the ideal to be aimed at was the devising of such a system of taxation that every citizen should contribute to the expense of the State in proportion to his means. In other words the ideal to be worked for was a universal and graduated income-tax—a tax under which everybody would pay something, some regular subscription to the great club to which they all belonged and which they called the State, but under which the subscription would be payable in proportion to the means of payment. Such a tax would enable them to sweep away at once the taxes on tea, sugar, and cocoa, and abolish the coal tax. It would enable them to prevent any further rise in local rates and to remove the worst anomalies of the local rating system. He did not think it would be just to use such a tax to abolish rates altogether, for he held that rates ultimately fell upon the owner of the soil, for if there were no rates, the owner of the soil would get more rent. Therefore to abolish rates altogether would be merely to put in the landowner's pocket something to which he had no right. But by preventing the future increase of rates it was clear that they were relieving the landowner of a contingent liability. Therefore they were justified in imposing a local death duty so as to compensate the community for the relief it had given to the landlord. Such a death duty would enable the community to secure in the best of all possible ways the unearned increment of the land. In addition such a reform would introduce a system of taxation which all the community would recognise as equitable to every class. He ventured, without going into detail, to suggest this as a radical solution of the whole problem of national and local taxation. He believed it was possible, as well as desirable, and because he believed that he appealed to his hon. friends around him not to block the path of progress by supporting a Bill which was based on antiquated metaphysics and false economics—a Bill which, if it were passed into law, would inflict cruel injustice on thousands of their fellow citizens possessed of only scanty means, and would compel them to pay beyond other members of the community for the crime—their sole crime—of having ventured to invest their savings in the soil of their native land.

On the return of Mr. SPEAKER after the usual interval,

*SIR HENRY CRAIK (Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities) said he wished to second the Motion which had been made that the Second Reading of this Bill should be taken six months hence. He would certainly not emulate previous speakers in occupying the time of the House at the great length which they had done. The mover and seconder of the Second Reading had repeated arguments of the most elementary character, which had not in one iota added to the strength of the case generally put forward in favour of this confiscatory Bill. He would refer to only one or two points brought forward by the mover and seconder of the Bill, one of whom had given the House a startling description of the sufferings of the poor by an imaginary case of a man who held up land available for building for two hundred years. The hon. Member who seconded this Bill wished them to think that the ground landlord might, at his own sweet will, and at any period he chose come down with a fell swoop and demand a higher ground rent upon the land. He took away the whole effect of the Bill, moreover, by saying that the proprietor of the land always managed to bargain himself out of any burden in spite of any Act of Parliament. The hon. Member had given them an instance in Aberdeen of how a certain advantageous bargain was made by a Land Association against the Harbour Commissioners of that City. The Land Association of Aberdeen, if he was rightly informed, was one largely owned by small investors who belonged to the working classes. Were a powerful Corporation like the Harbour Commissioners of Aberdeen, the people on whose behalf Parliament must step in to enable them to make an easier bargain with shareholders of the Land Association? Was that the reason why they were going to introduce this novel and unheard of machinery into the taxation and the rateable arrangements of the country? The seconder had given them some harrowing accounts of the housing of the working classes, as if he were the only hon. Member who wished to improve the conditions of working men. The hon. Member had said that all the people in Scotland were in favour of this measure, except perhaps a few land owners. For himself, he wished to treat the Bill as a Scottish measure, and he would have something to say of the genesis of the Bill in Scotland. He spoke on behalf of no landowner or wealthy corporation, but in the interests of great educational institutions, of many charities, of friendly societies, of many investors among the most thrifty and humble classes of the community, and also for many trade unions whose funds were thus invested. The Bill was started some years ago in Glasgow by a certain ex-Bailie Ferguson, who was the main mover in this agitation. How had he obtained the adhesion of the Town Council? They had his own explanation before the Commission in 1898. Replying to a question as to what views the Town Council held, he said—

> "They held four years ago that they would not support such a doctrine at all, and I told them that I would change their convictions or their seats, and I have done it."

He was asked, "And they have changed their convictions for the sake of keeping their seats?" He answered—

> "I am not bound to know the reasons, but in point of fact they run out and vote for taxation of land values."

Was that the way that hon. Members thought that public opinion should be manufactured? Were they proud of the support of the Glasgow Town Council obtained by means such as that? What did the Bill propose to do? It was called a Bill for the taxation of land values, but as a matter of fact it was confined to taxation of sites in urban districts. Something lay behind the discrepancy between the title of the Bill and its real purpose. There was a feud between the advocates of the taxation of land values generally and those who confined themselves to the taxation of urban sites. He wished hon. Members opposite to observe that hostility between two sections of their own Party. The hon. Baronet the Member for the Northwich Division of Cheshire had argued for the application of the principle to rural as well as to urban land In a letter to the Speaker on the point and dealing with the term "site values" he had said—

> "As a matter of fact the land immediately outside our urban boundaries is the largest field for the beneficial operation of the coming change in the law. The man who first started this pestilential notion of distinguishing urban from other land and the man who first spoke of 'site values' are as bad as Alexander the Coppersmith. But what in the name of Lincoln's Inn and all the other Inns is a site? If I were to use language of appropriate warmth in condemnation of the phrase and you were to print it, no respectable person would ever read the Speaker again."

The Bill proposed to value sites separately, and to rate them upon a yearly value of 4 per cent. of their capital valuation. But this was a small part of the Bill. Was it justified by any full and carefull investigation? They had had quotations from various authorities, but he would ask the House to examine what they were. The opinion of the Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes, which had been cited in favour of this Bill, was discounted by the dissentient remarks of the late Lord Salisbury and of Mr. (now Lord) Goschen. Lord Salisbury, dealing with the question of the rating of vacant land, said it had been suggested that it should be rated upon its capital value and not on its income. "This suggestion," the noble Marquess said, "had been introduced into the report just before it was signed, and he could not find that it was based upon any evidence before the Committee." Viscount Goschen also wished to record his "dissent from the recommendation of the report with reference to the rating of vacant lands." A much more important committee was the Select Committee on Town Holdings, which reported in 1892 in a sense directly opposite to the preliminary part of this measure. He now came to the Commission which had been referred to, that upon Local Taxation. The hon. Member for Preston had forgotten that the report which he had quoted was the Minority Report, and that the Commission as a whole reported against this plan. The hon. Member had pointed out how completely insufficient was even the report of the minority of the Commission to support the present Bill, because they stated that the grounds for the new proposals were chiefly sentimental and political, and they proposed that even if adopted this new Land Value Tax should be borne half by the owner and half by the occupier. The proposal to tax land values deserved careful criticism and consideration, and they must look at what it was intended to achieve and what was the object of it. It was argued that it would prevent the holding up of vacant spaces. He thought in regard to that, self-interest might be left to act. How could any holding up of vacant spaces in urban districts which defrauded the receiver of rates do otherwise than involve loss to the owner of property? If the landowner held it up, he did so because he thought that by dispensing with the return for a certain period he would afterwards get a larger return which would recoup him for his abstinence. If he did so, it was because he thought that the buildings which would afterwards be erected on it would be of such enhanced value that it would pay him to hold up. Would that not pay the rating authorities also? How could they fail to get the same advantage? The seconder of the Motion had adduced the case of the School Board of Cathcart. Was that hon. Member aware that the School Board could by a very simple process, under compulsory powers, have got the land at an arbitrator's valuation? If the School Board paid anything like the enhanced value which had been quoted they would have been guilty of a great dereliction of duty, of which he was certain they were not guilty. This part of the Bill would achieve very little. The machinery by which it was proposed to put it in force was bad. It introduced the doubtful principle of assessing the rateable value on capital value. Great injustice might be wrought. Land fluctuated in value, and in the neighbourhood of towns frequently an exaggerated value was put upon it. Supposing a piece of vacant land was taxed for twenty years on an exaggerated value, and when it came to be sold the real value was much less, were they going to return to the owner the overpaid rates? It would discourage one great aid to health in cities—namely, vacant spaces and garden grounds. No greater blow could be inflicted on the projectors of garden cities than the passing of this Bill. But the important blot upon the measure was its confiscatory element. That was the salient point by means of which and of which alone the originators of it would achieve the end they had in view. The Bill was pushed by two leagues—one in England and one in Scotland — formerly called the Land Restoration Leagues, and now reconstituted as the Leagues for the Taxation of Land Values. Their objects were shown by the evidence of Mr. Peter Burt, J.P.

> "Do you come here in any of your public capacities, or as President of the Scottish Land Restoration Union?—As President of the Scottish Land Restoration Union.
> "To whom are you going to restore the land?—To the people.
> "By this proposal?—Yes.
> "But this proposal will not restore it to the people, will it?—What people want land for in the sense of ownership is not for the land but for the rent, and if we restore the rent to the people we think that we do all that is necessary to satisfy them.
> "But are you by this proposal to restore the land to the community which does not now own the right of receiving rent?—We are to restore the rent to the whole community.
> "But all I understand this proposal as put before us to do, is to shift the burden of rating from one class of owner to another?—The proposal starts with altering the basis of taxation in relation to rentals, that is, instead of paying as at present, on the annual rent they receive from the tenant, they shall pay upon the annual value of the ground; that is the beginning of the principle or the foundation of the principle for altering the incidence of taxation altogether.
> "What is to be the next step?—Increase the tax upon the value of the ground.
> "Until you take it all?—Yes; until you take twenty shillings in the pound."

There was the same class of evidence from Bailie John Ferguson, who said that he held that nothing short of 20s. in the £ would be a complete settlement of the question. They were not, therefore, left in any doubt as to purposes of the Bill; and what was to be the end of it, even if this confiscation were justified? It would turn the municipality into a landlord, receiving rent by way of taxation. Could there be a more capricious, a more tyrannical, a more hard-hearted landlord than the tax receiver? What became of fixity of tenure? They were between the horns of a dilemma. Either every man would hold his land subject to the will of the rating authority, or else he would be allowed to acquire certain rights, it might be leasehold rights, in the land. The moment a man acquired these rights they became the subject of new purchase and sale. New rights were established, new increment began, and they had all their work to do over again. The real vice of the Bill was that it rested upon confiscation and robbery. If the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister were in his place he would appeal to him on this matter. He had had the honour of the friendship of the Prime Minister longer perhaps than any other Member of the House, and he was proud to count among his memories those who had gone before him and were great builders and architects of the prosperity of Glasgow—men who made it their aim to encourage the thrift and industry of Scotsmen. Did the Prime Minister think that those whose memories they both revered would have looked with favour on a Bill like this, or would have deemed it worthy of our national character? He would appeal to hon. Members below the gangway. He would use no language of fulsome flattery to them, but regarding them as men of strenuous work, of high equipment, of zealous energy and of strong conviction, he could only regret that such powers were not added to the assets of his own Party. He believed in their sincerity, and trusted that they would give him credit for equal sincerity in his convictions. But he would put this question to them—Was it not the case that if Clause 7 were cut out of the Bill they would tear it up and throw it in the face of the Government? [Cries of "No" and "Yes."] The reply of "Yes" was, he believed, the honest answer. They and the Government knew that that was the only clause that would enable the purpose of this Bill to be carried out, and they would never carry out that purpose merely by a change of the future incidence of taxation. As one of the speakers had told them, property would always bargain itself out of new burdens, and the object in view could only be achieved by taking it from the pockets of the actual holders who were bound by existing bargains. In fact, they could only achieve the principle of the Bill and meet the views of its supporters below the gangway by accepting this principle. They had had on the front Bench opposite a good many instances of trying to ride two horses. It was an experiment which the Prime Minister the other day said was impossible. But they had seen it done in the circus, and it was possible perhaps that it might be achieved in the Parliamentary arena. But he defied anyone to ride two horses down two different roads. He urged the Government to be bold enough to resist this dangerous and confiscatory Bill, and, on the other hand, he appealed to hon. Gentlemen below the gangway not to be deluded by conciliatory promises that were not likely to be fulfilled. Personally, if he were in their place, he would rather have to face downright, plain, and sincere opposition than conciliatory phrases which were not to be followed by any effective action.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day six months.'"—(Mr. Harold Cox.)

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. THOMAS SHAW, Hawick Burghs) said he had listened with some surprise to the speech which had just been made. He entirely agreed with his hon. friend—whom he was glad to welcome to this House—that it was a pity that on an afternoon devoted to a Bill which had been more than once before the House the speeches should have been of such length. He did not propose to follow the last speakers into those personal topics which they had shown a tendency to introduce; he would rather consider the Bill on its merits. One point, however, the hon. Member had evidently kept well in his mind—the view that the Bill was one, as he described it, of confiscation; and it could surely only have been by inadvertence that he had forgotten to refer to certain other terror-striking phrases, as for instance, the sacredness of the British Constitution. The hon. Member appeared to have been seriously concerned about the personal element: he had introduced a variety of characters. He had referred to Bailie Fergusson, to Alexander the coppersmith, and to Bailie Burt, while the hon. Member for Preston had taken fright, not at such homely characters, but at the great name of Henry George. Assuming that Henry George, Bailie Fergusson, and Bailie Burt would have approved of this Bill, it might all be very disconcerting, but do let them proceed to consider whether it was a good Bill. He would refer for a moment to the language as to confiscation used in all sincerity by his hon. friend opposite. After all, he hoped they would survive the terror with which he evidently intended to inspire them. The principle of the Bill was a familiar one. Parliament had discussed it time after time, and a majority of a Conservative House of Commons had voted for it before. The conditions, however, under which the Bill had been previously considered, and those under which it was considered that day, were strangely different. The opposition of the Bill today seemed to be attenuated in dimensions but accentuated in quality. The views of Scotland on the subject had been referred to. He knew them, he supposed, as well as his hon. friend, and one instance of his untenable position he might give. Was there, he asked, one Member representing the city of Glasgow who would oppose the principle of the Bill as it had been expounded to day? There was only one man from Glasgow who would go into the lobby against the Bill, and he was the representative, not of the community, but of the University of that city. Was it for a gentleman so situated to get up in the House and characterise as a measure of confiscation one which had been promoted for half a generation by the humane and generous men who had constituted the corporation of Glasgow, and supported by the entire body of its Parliamentary representatives? There had been a growth of public opinion recently on this subject, and why? It was accounted for by the fact that in recent years, owing to social demands, there had been an enormous increase of local taxation for poor law, local government education, and other purposes, and that since 1899 there had been added to the Imperial burdens of the country another crushing debt for Imperial causes. It was those things which had forced the overburdened ratepayer and taxpayer to consider whether it might not be possible, without confiscation, robbery, or any injustice whatever, to alter the incidence of taxation, at least, in such a way as would readjust it in a manner fairer as among all classes of the community. He asked the House to remember that it was on the report—it was true it was a minority report—of such men as Lord Balfour of Burleigh, the late Lord Kinross, Sir George Murray, and Sir Edward Hamilton, that the Bill was substantially framed. [Cries of "No."] It was possible for hon. Members to argue this matter, but argument did not consist in explosive interruptions. This Bill was not to be characterised by those hard terms which had been employed, when at the back of it there was the recorded opinion of the men of the highest authority in the State. The acuteness of the situation was one, as the House had been told, not only arising out of the increase of rating, but bearing upon the general alteration of social conditions. There had been report after report pointing out how serious was the situation in regard to this subject, not only as a rating question, but as a social question. Such rating of land tenures as was proposed in the Bill would act as a direct incentive to the owners to part with the land, to the manifest advantage, in the majority of cases, of the rest of the community; while in the meantime this valuable property would contribute to the rates something more nearly approaching its proper share, and the burden to other ratepayers would be pro tanto diminished. The very fact of taxation on real value would put land into the market, and the competition, moreover, which would follow in the sale of building land would necessarily bring its feuing rate more within the reach of public demand. The present rates for ground were a consequence of no expenditure of money or work on the part of the landowners but admittedly of the activity, enterprise and industry of the townspeople themselves. Could it be fairly called confiscation if a landowner, who chose to hang up his sites for a time and then get for them twenty times their initial cost, was asked to contribute something in the way of rating during the course of that increase — an increase which at present was being brought about by schemes in which he himself had not not been a partner and on which he had not expended a penny? The opinion of the Government in regard to the Bill was that the sifting of the subject by Commissions and by public discussion in Parliament had at least not put back the clock of this reform. The crudeness which sprang from a quick recoil from manifest injustice was disappearing from the scheme. That violence which was apt to spring from a bitterness of protest against our present social arrangements was also disappearing; and it had, in the opinion of the Government, been becoming clearer and clearer that the times were ripe for this reform. These were the feelings with which they approached the Bill. Not only had inquiry been made and concluded, not only had anything approaching violence been eliminated from the scheme, but the broad fact remained that the Bill could now be properly considered in the light of the inquiries which had been made—and not upon vague and terrifying notions of expropriation or confiscation. It was when the matter was considered in the light of the social considerations of the hour that the principle of the bill struck them as going in the direction not merely of social expediency but almost of social necessity. As to the attack made on the Bill, how did the matter stand in respect of unoccupied land. Did not unoccupied land in or near a city become valuable because of the privileges which surround its possession with comforts, amenity, means of communication, schemes of health, lighting, drainage, and all the other consequences of popular energy and expenditure—energy and expenditure to neither of which had the owner of the land, as such, been a contributor. So far from being a partner, indeed, the owner of such land was rather a parasite on the community. It was said that no new source of revenue would be tapped. He was not so sure of that. He would cite one illustration showing the evil of the present system. Unbuilt on land in Edinburgh was said to be rated at £2,750 per annum, bringing in £344 a year. If it were rated at 4 per cent. on the assessable capital value it would bring in at least £27,500 a year. Similarly at Leith the difference between the two systems was the difference between £350 and £24,000. In his opinion there was to be found in this direction a new and not improper source of revenue from taxation. The Bill would substitute a real for the existing fictitious system of valuation. In the words of the Royal Commission, present rates indisputably hampered building which was necessary to life and business of every kind, and anything which tended to discourage building must make houses fewer, worse, and dearer. He submitted that he had established the proposition that the social reform which accompanied the Bill was almost greater in its effect than the change in the incidence of taxation. An appeal had been made to Scottish independence. He happened to know a good deal about his own country, and he had never found the relation of the population to the law of the country better expressed than by Mr. Sherwell, who said—

> "The spectacle of one-half of the entire nation living under overcrowded conditions, while almost whole counties are preserved as deer forests and private parks, is as astounding as it is happily rare. Eight per cent. of overcrowded persons, which is the figure for Wales, pales into comparative insignificance beside 47 per cent., which is the measure of overcrowding in Scotland."

One half the nation in Scotland were crowded together at the rate of more than two persons to a room, while the whole population, if spread out, would have no less than four and one-third acres for every man, woman, and child in the kingdom. Those were conditions which Scotland could put forward a claim to have remedied, and, though this Bill would not accomplish all, let them begin. Appeals to independence were all very well, but he knew no better use to which an independent people could apply their brains and energies than to the upsetting of such a condition of things as that in Scotland. He knew it was said that the proposals of such a Bill as this were fantastic, and that the thing was impossible. It reminded him of a saying of Charles Reade—

> "The impossible has clothed itself in fact and has gone through the hollow mockery of taking place."

Yes, it had taken place—this very thing—in Germany, in our Colonies, and elsewhere. There had been vast schemes of re-housing in Glasgow, and enormous expenses had been incurred, but they had touched only the fringe of the evil. The civic barrel had had great resources poured into it, but the barrel leaked, the land value had not been hit. Every improvement in social conditions gave an opportunity for putting an extra value on land. The action Glasgow had taken in the past, and their attitude in the present, were alike meritorious. The holding up of land would largely disappear, and under this Bill every inducement would be held out for more and better buildings. The first requisite was to get a proper system of valuation, to substitute a real for a fictitious valuation, and the first four clauses of the Bill before the House substantially operated in that way. The impractability of the thing was disposed of by the experience of Mr. Henry, the assessor of Glasgow, whose opinion confirmed his own in all these arbitration cases, that it was not at all an impracticable thing to settle the value of the land and then settle the value of the houses upon the land. The Government approved of the principle of the first four clauses, and they thought that there was no reason why the new system of valuation proposed should not be proceeded with without delay. The next clause substantially gave power to put on taxation equivalent to a penny in the £ on capital value, but the Government were of opinion that a year at least should be allowed for the operation of the clauses affecting valuation before empowering assessment. This valuation would go through the ordinary run of appeals, in which principles might have to be adjusted and settled by the Courts, and, if they postponed until 1907 the assessment clause and made the valuation clauses operative now, there would, in the interim, be effected a most valuable reform in valuation, the principles of which would be settled, so that, when the assessment came to be laid in the following year, it might be done smoothly and without friction. As to the last clause, dealing with existing contracts, they were confronted with an enormous body of skilled opinion. The Majority and Minority Reports of the Royal Commission on Taxation and the separate Scottish Report all concurred in viewing with unfeigned hostility on grounds of principle the idea of attacking existing contracts. He looked upon this with considerable anxiety. He had not varied in his opinion on this matter. When the Bill was before the House two years ago he stated that he was against interference with existing contracts. The Minority Report said that existing contracts should be absolutely respected, but that in the case of future contracts the holder should be entitled to make the deduction—substantially as in Clause 7. The existing system in Scotland might have its defects. He thought it had its defects, and there was scope for a large and far-reaching measure dealing with the relations between superior and vassal, and even providing for the commutation of feu-duties. The Government proposed to follow the skilled opinion referred to. It did not matter who paid. The thing was what was going to pay. The land itself was going to pay, and the provision by way of deduction, by the man who paid, from some other body who got something out of it, had no effect upon the community as a whole, and, accordingly, the principle of the clause was intact. The seventh clause of the Bill was, no doubt, a protest against the system under which land had been held up, and profits had been got. But he desired to associate this great and salutary reform with no violence whatever to existing contracts, and with no invasion of rights sanctioned by the State. Under these rights sanctioned by the State interests had grown up, investments of money in trade unions and friendly societies, and great trusts like the Heriot Trust and others. All these things had grown up on the theory that the State had guaranteed a fixed net monetary return. But new contracts they might affect, and they ought to affect—and he proposed if the Bill went to the Grand Committee on Law to insert a single line making the seventh clause operative with regard to future transactions in land. He did not say that the Bill was a panacea for all existing evils. But it went near to the roots of many evils. This was a new Parliament, and they had been forced in recent times to consider principles at their foundations. They had been taunted with one-sided free trade. Yes: but what was the other side. It was stated by Cobden himself towards the close of his life in the sentence—

> "I would take Adam Smith in hand and I would have a league for free trade in land, just as we had a league for free trade in corn."

The object of this Bill was more and more to force land into the market, so as to make land transferable by depriving owners of the pecuniary advantage they had in holding it up as against the community itself. They had been taunted with parochialism. Yes: perhaps this was parochialism. But this modest, simple measure had, in the opinion of the Government, elements in it which might prove of more abiding welfare than those more ostentatious efforts which had provoked noise and tumult to begin with, and which had ended in exhaustion and prostration. Those great, much-heralded, much-boasted efforts had left untouched that weakness which was at the very heart of the social state It was to that weakness the new Parliament must address itself, and the Bill was welcomed by him, and would have the approval of the Government on the Second Reading, because it was one of, he hoped, not a few measures of like spirit, under which a quiet and determined effort was being made towards reaching the heart of our social trouble, and alleviating and curing it.

Mr. WHITTAKER (Yorkshire, W.R., Spen Valley) said he intervened in this debate because, in all probability, he had more to do with, and knew more about, land values than any other Member of the House. He warned hon. Members that, while no doubt some of the principles of this Bill were sound, it was not going to accomplish all or anything like all that was claimed for it. One would think, from the speeches which had been made, that this Bill was going a long way to solve the housing question, to increase wages, to reduce rates, to help the widow and orphan, and generally to bring about the millenium. All he could tell them was that it was going to do nothing of the kind. As the result of several years experience he had discovered that people had an idea that, when a lease ran out, and the property fell back into the hands of the ground landlord, a great injustice had been done to the person who was the lessee. In fact one hon. Member had said the landlords stole the property. In London he would point out, in the first place, there was every opportunity of buying freehold land. But supposing a private owner had leased a plot of land on which the lessee intended to erect property which he was to have the use of for ninety-nine years, he had only to set up a sinking fund, to indemnify himself when the property fell in. Hon. Members were apt to overlook the cumulative power of compound interest. One-fifth of a penny in the £ at 4 per cent. for ninety-nine years would pay for that, and, therefore, there was no very serious grievance there. The House was told that this Bill was going to bring building land into the market. In his judgment the tax proposed was not sufficient to do that. In his opinion the community ought to get practically the whole of the unearned increment of the land, but the Bill was going to do very little in that direction. Under this Bill they were going to get only 10 per cent. of it and it was intended to levy 10 per cent. in other directions where there was no justification for it. He could take hon. Members to estates with 100 houses let at £50 rental each per annum with a ground rent of £10 each. The head rent on the whole of the estate was probably not more than £5, which secured the reversion of the estate at the end of ninety-nine years. All the contribution that would be got out of that would be 10 per cent of £5. In the case of the leasehold ground rent of £10 on each house, precisely the same rate would have to be paid as in the case of the man who had the reversion. The middle man, the leaseholder, would have to pay on any increased value of the land and would get no advantage whatever. Then there was another curious provision in the Bill. It was proposed only to charge if the lease were more than thirty-one years. Surely, if the lease were short, the landlord would come into the benefit all the sooner, and yet he was to be the man who was to be relieved. They might take localities where improvements had been effected at the cost of the community, and the money was borrowed for twenty-five or thirty years. The tenant in that case would pay the interest for the repayment of the loan, and according to the Bill he was not to charge back upon the landlord anything at all. That meant that the nearer the direct interest of the landlord the less he had to pay, the longer it was the more he paid. Was that common-sense and reasonable? He ventured to think it was not. Then take the case most prevalent in Scotland where there was practically a permanent rent change. There was no reversion there. It would be most unjust to break contracts in order to levy a tax. Last year there was something very much like an understanding that that clause was to come out of the Bill, but it was in the Bill again this year. He did not object to the taxation of site values. He believed it was sound that they should adopt some method of getting this unearned increment, especially in our large towns. There was no reason whatever why, for the future, the additional value given to land by the expenditure and labour of the community should not all of it be got into the pocket of the community without injustice being done to anybody. But the promoters of this Bill would not get by it the advantages they thought in many directions. They could not dodge the laws of political economy. If they put on these taxes as provided for in the Bill, then, of course, for the future everybody who invested in or created ground rents would invest in them or create them with a full knowledge of what was before them, and would arrange accordingly. If it were true that the rates and taxes always came out of the landlord the position would be practically the same. If, on the other hand, it was true that the tenant paid the rates and taxes, then they could be sure that when the landlord was making his bargain with the tenant they would come out of the tenant just the same. But if they could not dodge the laws of political economy in that way they might get a much larger proportion of the cost of local administration put upon great central sites which were increasing in value. Another thing was that when anyone was engaged in laying out a large estate a very important matter was the amount he could get for the ground rents. If he could sell the ground rents at a good price he sold the leasehold interest in the houses at a much lower price. There were cases in which the leasehold interest in a house was sold at a lower price than it cost to build the house. The profit was got out of the ground rent, but the net result was that the total cost, including the ground rent, worked out as well as if it were a freehold. If they diminished the price to be got for the ground rent, as they would by rating it, they would thereby increase the price that would have to be paid for the house. These things cut in many ways, and he did not want the House to form incorrect views as to what was going to occur. The main principle of taxing site values was right and just. It would be inequitable, however, to disturb the whole of the existing contracts. As for the future, those who had to deal with the matter would know how to take care of themselves. He took a great amount of interest in this question, but he had not a penny of interest in ground rents himself, except that he had to pay a ground rent on his own house to one of the large landowners of London, but he wished to warn his hon. friends against entertaining the idea that they were about to start the millennium by the passing of this Bill.

MR. PARKER (Halifax) said that in making his first speech he would not begin by saying that he did not intend to make a long speech, because when Members offered that statement they usually followed the exactly opposite course. Although he and his friends did not expect the Bill to bring about the millennium, they realised that it was a step in the right direction. The present system of rating in our towns and cities for local purposes was in the opinion of those acquainted with municipal life antiquated and unjust. Some years ago he took it upon himself early in his connection with municipal life to compare the rateable values of the areas where villas were erected with the values of the slum areas, and he found that, as a matter of fact, the poorer classes of the community under the existing system of rating paid much heavier rates according to the ground they occupied than the wealthier classes. Whatever the Bill might or might not do, it would in time, he thought, remove that condition of things. The landowning classes obtained the greatest advantages from municipal developments at the expense of the ratepayers. During the past thirty years rates of the towns had been doubled, and they must of necessity go on increasing, for every fresh piece of legislation passed by this House must tend to send up municipal rates, and unless some new source of taxation was found it was utterly useless to cry out against the continual increase. What would be the result if this Bill were in operation to-day? Take the case of his own town. Some years ago a street was cut through a piece of vacant land, the price paid for which was about £4 per yard. In a very few years the piece of land went up to £10 per yard, and during the past two years the council had paid £20 a yard for some of it for street improvements. The average price at which the whole land had been sold had considerably more than doubled. Certain hon. Members had argued that in such a case the landlord would be able to shift the whole of the tax proposed. He would not say that in some cases the landlord would not shift it, but he certainly could not in regard to the pieces of land which grew rapidly in value in the centres of large towns. No doubt there had been a rise in the wages of skilled workmen during the past twenty years, but fully 30 per cent. of that was required for increased rent. They could not hope to see rents reduced unless they dealt with the rating problem. The present rates in towns were a tax on the thrift and industry of the people, and there was probably not a town in the United Kingdom where, if such a scheme was in operation, the rates would not be reduced by at least 10 or 15 per cent. in a few years. That would be something at least to accomplish. The present methods of local rating blocked improvements rather than helped them, formed and tended to continue unemployment, where otherwise employment might be found. Of course it was true that the development of municipal tramways, electricity, etc., found some portion of profits in relief of rates, but it could not keep pace with the ever-growing expenditure unless municipal activity were extended on a much larger scale. While he and others did not regard this measure as the only necessary thing—indeed, they looked upon it as only the beginning of social reform—yet they regarded it as of some value to improve the condition of the people. The hon. Member for Glasgow University spoke of it as a measure of confiscation, but what about the confiscation of values by the men who took value from the community—the land value which had accrued through nothing which the landlord himself had done, but through the industry, thrift, and activity of the people individually and collectively? The question of land values had been debated over and over again, and he was satisfied that they should not talk much more about the measure, but proceed to pass it into law.

MR. COCHRANE (Ayrshire, N.) said he had listened to all the excellent speches made on this subject in the hope of being able to form some clear idea of what the Bill actually proposed to do. Although no one would object to anything in the sentiments which had been expressed, he thought there had been a great want of lucidity in the explanations of the Bill as it stood. Almost every hon. Member who had spoken in its favour had given reasons for a Bill, but in each case he had said he would not be satisfied with the provisions of this particular Bill to carry out the desirable objects. He would willingly have many of the improvements eloquently referred to by the Lord-Advocate carried into effect, but he could not see how the right hon. and learned Gentleman's sentiments tallied with the provisions of the Bill. He had, however, on this as on previous occasions had the courage of his convictions. On the part of the Government he had admitted that if the Bill got into Committee, the pressure of the Government would be brought to bear to exclude Clause 7 of the Bill.

MR. THOMAS SHAW: I said I hoped to make it applicable.

MR. COCHRANE said that no doubt in appearance the Bill would be the same, but the spirit and the vitality would be for ever departed. The main object of hon. Gentlemen below the gangway, it might be, was to get at the man to whom the land, which had increased in value through no effort of his own, belonged. But he ventured to say that if the clause were dealt with in the manner adumbrated by the Lord-Advocate, that object would fall to the ground, and they would merely increase the burden on the shoulders of those who now bore it. All that the honourable mover would succeed in doing would be to secure that where the cloak had been taken, the coat should be taken also. It could not be seriously contended that this Bill was based upon the Minority Report of the Commission. In almost every important point the Report differed. The Minority Commissioners were of opinion that the rating of vacant land should be accompanied by a liberal and far-sighted policy in the direction of acquiring parks and gardens for public use. That was extremely desirable, but it did not appear among the provisions of the Bill. There were other safeguards advocated by the Minority Commissioners which did not find a place in the Bill. The honourable mover and the honourable seconder had made speeches which were not exactly, as he thought, upon this particular measure. The honourable seconder gave expression to many admirable sentiments, and hoped that if this Bill were passed into law the result would be that where a man now paid £16 a year rent he would only have to pay £8. There was a platform ring, he thought, about those sentiments that was an echo of the recent general election. The hon. Member for Preston had effectively exposed the character of the measure. He did not approach with a natural predilection any speech delivered by an hon. Member holding views in entire opposition to the views he himself held, but he had listened with interest to the hon. Member's clear and unanswerable arguments in regard to the disastrous effect the Bill would have in making houses and land far dearer instead of cheaper. The hon. Member had also described the Bill as a perverted form of Protection. It certainly did seem strange that supporters of the Government should say that to put a tax on ground rents would cheapen house rent, whereas if they put a tax on wheat it would raise the price of bread. It seemed to him that if they put a tax upon ground rents the ultimate result would be to increase house rent. That had been the effect in every country that had tried it. In his view the prime elements of cheapness were private initiative. This Bill would not encourage that. It would not give capital that security which it required. He had hoped the Lord Advocate would explain the Bill, but if the right hon. Gentleman would allow him, he would ask him to clear up one or two points of difficulty. In the first place the title of the Bill was somewhat misleading. It was said to be a Bill—

> "To provide for the taxation for local purposes of land values in Scotland, and for the compulsory acquisition of land by local authorities in Scotland."

Nothing, however, appeared in the provisions of the Bill dealing with the acquisition of land. That was extremely, almost grossly, misleading. Was it the intention of the promoters to attract unwary flies to their net by this title? [Cries of "No."] It seemed rather strange, at any rate, that it should not have been explained.

MR. SUTHERLAND: If the hon. Gentleman had been present at the opening of the proceedings on this Bill, he would have heard my explanation on this particular point.

MR. COCHRANE hoped he had not done the hon. Gentleman any injustice. The explanation must have been very early in the proceedings, for he came in almost at the opening. He agreed, however, with an hon. Member on the Ministerial side who, in April, 1904, wrote to the Daily News that in his opinion it was equitable that if unoccupied land was rated in the belief that its owner had a good thing, the owner should be given the right to demand that the community should take up the good thing and its accruing unearned increment. Supposing that they did put extra taxes on land on that account, the landlord surely ought to be able to say to them, "You consider this land worth a largely increased sum of money; if so, then take it over yourself; you are welcome to it." There was a difficulty in Clause 1. How on earth the provisions of that clause were going to be carried out he did not know. The proprietor, or reputed proprietor, had got to estimate the annual value as between a willing seller and a willing buyer. How was a working man to take on the somewhat difficult task of measuring the ground and estimating its value? If the proprietor did not succeed in doing this he was liable to imprisonment. In large centres in Scotland there was what was known as the tenement or flat system, and in each case the tenement or flat was owned by the vassal himself. How was it conceivable that under this measure each owner of a flat or part of a flat would be able to assess the proportion of the ground upon which his tenement was built, and hand it in to the proper authority? That was perfectly ridiculous, impractical, and impossible, and that provision alone was sufficient to condemn the measure. Was it possible for a working man to value accurately the ground upon which a house was to be built? There were whole streets of these tenement houses in Glasgow and Edinburgh, and the owner of each flat would be called upon to make this ridiculous and absurd assessment. It had been said that this Bill emanated very largely from Glasgow. The hon. Member for Glasgow had given to the House some of the reasons why the Town Council of Glasgow supported this measure, and one reason was that if they did not do so they would probably lose their seats. But even under those circumstances the Bill did not meet with very much support in Glasgow. The idea seemed to be that some one had to be taxed and a victim had to be found, without any reasons being given why that particular individual should be the owners of ground values. It was almost the invariable rule in Scotland for builders to acquire land on a fee-simple or absolute title. The difference between the Scottish and the English cases was that whereas the feu was a perpetual charge, in England the lease came to an end, and the landlord might perhaps get some advantage from the increased value as far as the improvements were concerned. The Scottish landowner had none of those advantages, for he sold his land at a perpetual interest, and whether the land was improved or not he was unable at any period to get a higher interest than that for which he had contracted, and that made a very great difference. He had no reversionary right, and he had no vote. Would hon. Gentlemen insist upon taxation without representation? He supposed that this Bill was one of those efforts at "cleaning the slate," of which they had heard so much. Undoubtedly the hardship of this Bill would fall upon the small investor. Feus had always been a favourite form of investment amongst the working classes of Scotland. All the benefit and friendly societies had invested their small savings in the purchase of feu-duties. He did not quite understand whether Clause 7 of this Bill was to stand or not.

MR. THOMAS SHAW said he thought he had made that point quite clear. Clause 7 was an excellent clause if applied prospectively, but he proposed at a subsequent stage to put at the beginning of the clause a proviso making it absolutely clear that the clause had no retrospective effect.

MR. COCHRANE said what the right hon. Gentleman had promised was to meet the point raised by the Royal Commission in order that existing contracts should not be interfered with, because to do that would be a very grave and indefensible action. The right hon. Gentleman endorsed the view of the Royal Commission on this point, and he understood that he would admit of no compromise upon that.

Mr. SUTHERLAND rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Mr. SPEAKER withheld his assent, and declined then to put the Question.

MR. COCHRANE, continuing, said he thought it was hard that hon. Members opposite should attempt to interfere with the principle of free discussion, because, after all, they were now dealing with a great matter of principle. The object of this Bill was to levy taxation upon capital, and he hoped the House would listen to what he had to say. How would this Bill affect charitable institutions? It was a common joke with Englishmen that Scotchmen were supposed to be extremely near, and therefore anything which affected the power and influence of those institutions affected Scotchmen in a marked degree. This Bill would affect seriously the Merchant Company of Edinburgh and the institutions connected with it, for they had money invested in feu-duties amounting to £16,000. This money belonged mostly to charitable and educational endowments and funds for the widows of members. If this Bill were passed, at thirty years purchase the income of this institution would be diminished by one-tenth, or a capital sum of £48,000. These institutions denied that they held up their land, for they were at all times willing to feu at the market value at the prices obtainable by auction. One of the chief attractions of Edinburgh was its open spaces. If they went along Prince's Street they would see the numerous open spaces of which Scottish Members were so proud. If they were to pass any measure which would crowd over those open spaces with bricks and mortar it would be a national disaster. This Bill would discourage the laying out of garden cities and open spaces. The feeding of children, fresh air, and healthy playgrounds were as great a necessity as good houses. How on earth his hon. friend who moved this Bill made out that it was going to improve the housing of the working classes by increasing the cost of the ground he could not for the life of him see. He would give an instance of one of those magnates who were supposed to make these bloated sums out of feuing land. There was an estate of 700 acres within the city, of which 386 acres were feued, and 34 acres open spaces and parks. The cost of development was £204,000, out of which £112,000 had been recovered, leaving £92,000 outstanding, only part of which was recoverable. In addition to ground which was given for a railway and numerous open spaces, twenty miles of roads and sewers were made. He ventured to say that in this case the public had benefited as much the owner. Such a large capital outlay as this was only possible where the State secured to the proprietor that the contract he had entered into should be faithfully and duly observed. He opposed this Bill on several other grounds. He agreed with the Minority Report of the Royal Commission, which stated that there had been a great deal of misconception and exaggeration prevalent on this subject. These proposals would weaken security and tend to congest areas and would not facilitate the purchase of open spaces and gardens. The supposed direct taxation of feu-duties would violate the law of contract and involve injustice without securing any public benefit. It would not benefit the ratepayers or the working classes, and only the present owners of houses would be benefited, because future purchasers would have no share in the benefit. It would injure numerous charitable institutions and private investments, and the principal sufferers would be the frugal, the provident, the industrious, and the poor. It would involve a reversal of the uniform practice of Parliament, and it would be a violation of the well-established canons of political economy. Although he believed the Bill had been considerably weakened by the statement made by the right hon. Gentleman, nevertheless he should vote against it.

PATENTS, DESIGNS, AND TRAD MARKS (REGISTRATION OF PATEN AGENTS) BILL [H.L].

[SECOND READING.]

LORD COLERIDGE: My Lords, th Act of 1888, which my Bill seeks t amend, was passed in consequence of th Report of a Departmental Committe appointed by the Board of Trade, whic recommended that a register should b instituted of patent agents, and that th Board of Trade should have the powe to erase the names of those who wer proved by a committee appointed b them to have been guilty of disgracefu professional conduct. The Act provide that no person should practice as patent agent, or, rather, that no perso should use the words "patent agent," unless he was registered as such; and th result of that was that a number of persons, some of whom had been actuall struck off the register for disgracefu professional conduct, continued to practice as before by the mere substitution of titles like "patent expert" and "inventors' agent," and the object of the Act, which was to protect inventors was largely frustrated. In consequence a Bill—practically my Bill—was introduced into the House of Commons in 1894, and it there passed its Second Reading and was referred to a Select Committee. The Select Committee passed unanimously the clause which is the substantive clause in my Bill and then the general election came and the Bill, like many others, went into limbo and was not heard of again.

Last year I introduced the Bill into your Lordships' House, and it was read a second time. It proceeded no further owing to certain objections being taken to it in detail, but those objections I have largely met by adding this year a clause providing that all existing interests shall be preserved, which I think is quite fair and right. I now ask the House to give the Bill a Second Reading, as it did last year, and if there are any objections to it they can be dealt with in Committee. The principle of the Bill has been affirmed by both Houses of Parliament, and the measure meets a want largely felt by the profession.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2ª."—(Lord Coleridge.)

THE EARL OF GRANARD: My Lords, I have to say, on behalf of His Majesty's Government, that they have no objection to the Second Reading of this Bill. His Majesty's Government, however, reserve to themselves the right of moving any Amendments which they may think desirable when the Bill reaches the Committee stage.

On Question, Bill read 2ª and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-morrow.

CRIMINAL APPEAL BILL [H.L.].

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord LOREBURN): My Lords, there has been some little misunderstanding in this important Bill's being put down for Second Reading without adequate notice. I propose, therefore, to postpone the Second Reading until to-morrow. I think that will meet the convenience of those of your Lordships who take an interest in this question.

Order for Second Reading postponed till to-morrow.

Admiralty Cruiser Programme.

SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty whether, having regard to the stipulation of the Secretary to the Treasury that the Admiralty should take the earliest opportunity of informing Parliament of the change in the cruiser programme of 1904–5, Parliament was similarly informed of the change in the cruiser programme of 1905–6.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) The change in the cruiser programme for 1904–5 was made public in the Explanatory Statement presented to Parliament with the Estimates for the following year. A similar course was adopted this year as being that most desirable in the interests of the public service.

Aberdeen Railway Station.

MR. PIRIE (Aberdeen, N.): To ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been drawn to the present condition of the Aberdeen railway station, part of which structure is in a state of complete decay and dilapidation; and, having regard to the recent accident at Charing Cross station, if he will cause inquiries to be made from officials on the spot in order to insure the protection of the public from a similar danger; can he also state what steps, if any, are being taken by the railway companies concerned, the Caledonian and Great North of Scotland, to complete the works sanctioned by The Aberdeen Joint Passenger Station Act, 1899, the powers of which expire in August, 1907; and can he see his way to enforce the carrying out of the works then sanctioned, in view of the necessity for increased station accommodation in Aberdeen, and the danger and inconvenience involved by the existing state of affairs.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I am aware that there is long-standing and general dissatisfaction with the condition of this station, and I have invited the observations of the railway companies concerned upon my hon. friend's Question.

In their reply the companies state that the condition of the existing structure is not such as to involve danger to the public. As regards alterations, they point out that the widening of the railway between Ferryhill Junction and the station, and other portions of the works authorised by the Act of 1899, have now been completed. They add that the enlargement of the station, which could not be undertaken pending the completion of those portions of the works, is now under consideration, and that so soon as the plans have been adjusted the work will be proceeded with. After a reasonable interval I propose to inquire what progress has been made, and shall hope to be able to give a satisfactory Answer to a further Question, should my hon. friend find it desirable to put one at a later date.

Argentine Railway Locomotive Orders.

MR. HOUSTON (Liverpool, West Toxteth): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he has any official information to the effect that one Argentine railway company, whose shareholders are British and whose board of directors reside in England, recently placed an order for thirty locomotives with German manufacturers; whether he can ascertain the respective prices of the English and German manufacturers; whether there is in the possession of his Department, or that of the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, a Report from a certain British Consul, stating that the German Government are giving a bounty to German locomotive builders to enable them to successfully compete with English locomotive builders; and whether he will lay the said Consular Report upon the Table; whether he can give any explanation as to the contradictory Report recently received from Berlin to that given by the said British Consul; and whether he will endeavour to ascertain the true facts, and lay them upon the Table.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I have no official information as to the purchases of locomotives by particular Argentine Railway Companies or the prices at which they are purchased. With regard to the reported German bounty on locomotives I can add nothing to my previous Answer † until the completion of the inquiries now being made.

S. S. "Saint Dunstan."

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON (Middlesbrough): To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state whether the s.s. "Saint Dunstan" signed on a crew at Hamburg during the present month; whether he can state how many of the sailors and firemen were Britishers, and how many were foreigners, and the wages per month paid to the sailors and firemen.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I have at present no information, either at the offices of the Board of Trade or with the Registrar-General of Seamen, with regard to any articles that may have been recently signed in the case to which the hon. Member alludes, but inquiries are being made; and, if the hon. Member will put his Question down again, I hope to be in a position to give him an Answer.

Office of Registrar-General of Shipping and Seamen.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that dissatisfaction exists in the office of the Registrar-General of Shipping and Seamen with the remuneration of the staff; and whether, seeing that a Committee of Inquiry was promised some considerable time ago, he will make inquiries into the matter and appoint a Committee at an early date to investigate their alleged grievances.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I am aware that more than one petition has been sent in to the Board of Trade by clerks in the office of the Registrar-General of Shipping and Seamen, with regard to their pay and prospects. No promise of a Committee of Inquiry has been made, but the matter has received, and is receiving, consideration.

Sick Seamen's Transport.

MR. HAVELOCK WILSON: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Finance Department of the Board of Trade is deducting from the wages of seamen who are left in hospital abroad the cost of their hospital expenses and passage home; whether he can state under what regulations or section of the Merchant Shipping Act Board of Trade officials are empowered to make such deductions from the wages of sick seamen; and whether he will give instructions for this practice to be discontinued.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) The expenses referred to by the hon. Member are deducted from the wages of seamen who are left behind on account of unfitness or inability to proceed on the voyage, under Section 189 of The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. The expenses are not, however, deducted if the cause of leaving behind is hurt or injury in the service of the ship within the provisions of Section 207. The practice is in accord with the provision of Section 189 of the Act of 1894.

S. S. "Iquique"—Case of Joseph Rey.

Mr. HAVELOCK WILSON: To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether his attention has been called to the case of a steward, named Joseph Rey, a native of Mauritius, who joined the sailing ship "Iquique" at Newcastle, New South Wales, on April 23rd, 1905, and was discharged at Valparaiso on December 30th, 1905, in consequence of injuries received in his stomach whilst in the service of his ship; whether he is aware that this man was sent from Valparaiso to Liverpool, and that the Board of Trade Officials at Liverpool deducted from Rey's wages the sum of £6 to cover the cost of his hospital expenses and passage home; and whether, seeing that the Merchant Shipping Act provides that such expenses shall be borne by the owner of the ship, he will cause inquiry to be made into this case, and direct that the £6 shall be paid over to Rey at once, seeing that he is now destitute in London.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) The information in possession of the Board of Trade is to the effect that Rey was not injured in the service of the ship. As, however, the hon. Member states that he was so injured, I will make further inquiries into the matter.

Seamen's Records.

Mr. HAVELOCK WILSON: To ask the President of the Board of Trade if he can state why the Board of Trade have failed to keep at the General Registry and Record Office of Shipping and Seamen a register of all seamen, as required by Section 252 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894; whether he is aware that, in consequence of no such register being kept of the engagement and discharge of men employed on British ships, seamen are unable to obtain a true record of their past services on British ships; and whether, seeing that the cost of maintaining such a register of all seamen would not exceed £2,000 per annum, he will have the matter inquired into with a view to the establishment of such register.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I am informed by the Registrar-General of Seamen that he does actually keep at his office a register of all seamen, as required by Section 252 of The Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. It is possible that this register is not kept in the manner desired by the hon. Member, but two Committees have reported that the advantages to be gained by the establishment of a central indexed register would not justify its cost. The cost of starting such a register would be over £5,000, and it would take at least £1,800 a year to maintain.

Irish Land Act Administration.

Mr. GINNELL (Westmeath, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the pink schedules, Form 39, on the files in rent-fixing cases commonly show that the landlord has not made any improvement, that improvements have been made, and that the rent has been fixed on the gross value, including the improvements, on the ground that although the court valuer has ascertained and reported the improvements the tenant has not claimed them by schedule in court; and whether His Majesty's Government will enforce the law requiring all improvements to be deemed the tenant's until the contrary has been shown, and exempting the tenant's improvement from rent.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the Land Commission that the pink schedules referred to do not commonly show the result which is stated in the first part of the Question. The Commissioners fix fair rents in accordance with the provisions of the Land Law Acts, and the procedure is regulated by statutory rules. As to the concluding part of the Question, I am afraid that I have nothing to add to the reply which I gave to the hon. Member on Wednesday last.

MR. GINNELL: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland will he arrange that in all Reports and Returns of transactions under the Land Act of 1903, when the land dealt with is untenanted, the Poor Law valuation shall be shown in lieu of yearly rent.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Land Commission inform me that untenanted land is, as a rule, purchased by the Estates Commissioners for division into parcels and distribution amongst the classes of persons referred to in Section 2 (1) of the Act of 1903. The tenement valuation is not always ascertainable even for the untenanted land so purchased as a whole, and when such land is divided into parcels it becomes necessary to have a revision of the tenement valuation to suit each parcel sold. This revision is not completed until after the untenanted land has been divided. It would not, therefore, be possible to show in the Returns the valuation in respect of the resales of such land in parcels.

Irish Inland Fisheries.

MR. BOLAND (Kerry, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is now prepared to take practical steps to remove the obstacles which at present prevent the inspectors from holding inquiries on the subject of inland fisheries in Ireland.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I think that some legislation on this subject is desirable, but I cannot at present say whether it may be possible to introduce such legislation this year.

Gerahies Boatslip.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork County, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether application has been made to the Congested Districts Board for a boatslip at Gerahies, Bantry, county Cork; and whether, in view of the fact that the fishermen in that district are hampered for want of accommodation to land their fish, he will have a slip provided for them.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) An application to the effect stated was received from the Bantry rural district council, and on the 16th October last the Congested Districts Board informed the district council that, if the Cork County Council should undertake the construction of a suitable landing place at Gerahies, the Board would consider what contribution they could make towards the work. No further communication has been received from the district council.

Kilfinane Schools.

MR. LUNDON (Limerick, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland can he say what is the number of children for whom, according to the standard of the Commissioners of national education in Ireland, accommodation exists in the female and infant schools at Kilfinane, county Limerick; what has been the number on the rolls and in average attendance for the last two quarters; is he aware that classes have been held during the winter months in sheds in the school yard; and that the manager has made an application to the Commissioners for a building grant for the erection of a boys' school so as to relieve the congestion; will he say what answer has been given by the Commissioners to this application; how long has the correspondence between the manager and the Commissioners on this matter been going on; and can he suggest any means by which a building grant for these schools may be obtained without further delay.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the Commissioners of National Education that the Kilfinane convent national school for female and infant pupils affords accommodation for 197 pupils, according to the Commissioners' requirements as to space. The number on the rolls on the 31st December, 1905, was 330, and the average attendances for the quarters ending 30th September and 31st December, 1905, were 284 and 283, respectively. The Commissioners are aware that classes have been held in sheds in the school yard on account of the insufficient space afforded by the school room. On the 14th August, 1905, the manager applied for a grant towards building a school house for boys, so that the present boys' school might be utilised to relieve the congestion in the convent school. On the 14th October, 1905, the manager was informed that as the existing funds for building grants were already hypothecated, his application could not be considered for the present. The need for additional accommodation was brought to the Commissioners' notice by the manager on the 9th September, 1904, and the Commissioners, having obtained and considered special Reports from their inspector, issued to the manager on the 16th December, 1904, the necessary forms on which to make application for a building grant. These forms were never returned by him. The question of the revision of plans for building school houses is under the consideration of the Irish Government and the Treasury, and will be decided with as little delay as possible.

Magheradown Estate, Cavan.

Mr. YOUNG (Cavan, E.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether on the Magheradown estate, county Cavan, the Estates Commissioners have sanctioned the advances, and have vested the holdings in the tenants; and, if so, were the conditions as arranged by Captain Starkey, the vendor, carried out of reinstating the evicted tenants; and, if they have not been so carried out, will he explain why this has not been done.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that no proceedings for the sale of this estate have yet been instituted before them.

Labourers' Cottages in the Newcastle Union.

Mr. O'SHAUGHNESSY (Limerick, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Newcastle West District Council are promoting an improvement scheme under the Labourers Acts, and that only forty cottages can be built under it before the 1s. in the pound limit is expended, that thirty-two farmers whose names they are including therein have given consent to the district council to acquire the plots, and that the district councillors guarantee that eight more will give it; and whether, under these circumstances, he will say what is the quickest way to forward the scheme and the best way to reduce the expense of inquiries, and law and clerical business in connection with it, which in former schemes cost from £30 to £40 per cottage, or one-third of the amount paid for cottage and plot.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Local Government Board are aware that the Newcastle Rural District Council have under consideration a new improvement scheme under the Labourers Acts. The clerk of the council estimated that forty cottages with acre allotments, and forty additional half-acres for existing cottages could be provided within the rating limit. Consents appear to have been received from thirty-two occupiers in the case of the forty proposed cottages, and seventeen occupiers in the case of the forty additional half-acres, but unless the consent of the owners should also be obtained it will be necessary for the council to seek compulsory powers of acquiring the lands. If the consent of all parties can be obtained, the council can make what is known as a scheme by agreement, in which case the Board would be disposed to dispense with the usual advertisements, but the scheme must be inquired into, and a formal Provisional Order be made. By proceeding in this way the council would save the expense of advertising the scheme and of serving preliminary notices and copies of the Provisional Order on owners and occupiers; and, if all parties were agreed, the cost of the inquiry would also be largely reduced, as the council would only have to prove the necessity for the additional accommodation, while the cost of arbitration proceedings would be saved altogether.

Commitments for Contempt of Court.

MR. McHUGH (Sligo, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to proceedings in the Land Judge's Court in Dublin, on 9th March, when attachments had been issued against Thomas J. Smith, J.P., Joseph Mulligan, and Terence Fitzpatrick; whether he is aware that the three defendants named were charged with a criminal offence, and pleaded not guilty, and demanded, through their counsel, a trial in accordance with constitutional usage; and whether, seeing that there is no appeal from the order made sentencing the defendants to unlimited terms of imprisonment, and that under that order they may be kept in prison for life unless they plead guilty of a charge which they deny having committed, he proposes to introduce legislation to deal with the matter.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I answered this Question on Tuesday last, when, in the hon. Member's absence, it was put on his behalf by the hon. Member for East Mayo.†

Fair Rent Disabilities.

MR. O'DOWD (Sligo, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that tenants, or their successors in title, who sub-let before 1881, and who own less than seven-eighths of their holdings, are not permitted to enter the Land Courts to have fair rents fixed; and, if so, what steps the Government propose to take with the object of removing this disability.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am advised that the statement of the law in the Question is quite correct. The policy of the Irish Land Acts has always hitherto been to confine the privilege of having fair rents fixed to occupying tenants, and to exclude middlemen from these provisions. Any alteration in the law, such as the hon. Member suggests, would involve a complete change in this policy.

Land Commission Annuitants.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY (Cavan, W.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the average number of Land Commission annuitants sued twice yearly for their annuities; and whether he would issue instructions that proceedings be only taken once a year, with a view to avoiding legal costs by the present double proceedings, or if the necessary legislation to deal with the matter will be introduced.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the Land Commission that it would not be possible to answer the first inquiry without an elaborate investigation, which would occupy a considerable time. Every new purchaser is informed that if the half-yearly instalment of the annuity is not paid within fourteen days he will become liable to immediate proceedings, and that under no circumstances can an extension of time for payment be granted. Prompt payment of the half-yearly instalment is necessary, in order to provide for the payment of the half-yearly dividends on the stock created for the purpose of making advances for land purchase. The Answer to the final inquiry is, therefore, in the negative.

Wexford Oyster Beds.

MR. FFRENCH (Wexford, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Wexford oyster beds have become almost exhausted, owing to the fact that they have, within recent years, been over-fished by foreign boats, as well as damaged by trawlers; and whether the Board of Agriculture contemplate taking any steps to have these beds relaid and protected.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction are not aware that any foreign boats have, within recent years, fished for oysters on the Wexford beds. Steam trawling is prohibited for a considerable distance off Wexford harbour, and the Department consider that no material damage is done by sailing trawlers on the grounds where oysters exist in any number. The Department do not consider that relaying oyster beds in the open sea is likely to be attended with success.

Roscrea Evicted Tenant.

MR. T. L. CORBETT (Down, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Lucas, of Roscrea, who has rented a town park at Glen Albert, from which the tenant was evicted five years ago for non-payment of rent, has been prevented from grazing his cattle upon the land by the action of the former tenant; and whether steps will be taken to prevent such interference in the future.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that neither the landlord nor the tenant has made any complaint to the police as to the occurrence alleged in the Question, and that the local police have not witnessed any such ocurrence.

Roscrea Castle.

MR. T. L. CORBETT: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that negotiations are in progress for the purchase from the War Office of the castle at Roscrea, King's County, for use as a bacon factory, and that this building dates from the time of King John, and possesses features of historical interest; whether he is aware that, owing to the imperfect drainage of Roscrea, the establishment of a bacon factory in the centre of the town would be likely to give rise to a dangerous nuisance; and whether, on antiquarian and sanitary grounds, he will take steps to prevent this project being carried out.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed that there are two ancient castles at Roscrea, one founded in 1213 by King John, and the other in 1281 by Edmund Butler, afterwards Earl of Carrick. The Question appears to refer to the latter castle, which is now the property of the War Department and is in good preservation. I am informed by my right hon. friend the Secretary of State for War that certain persons interested in the establishment of a bacon factory at Roscrea have approached the War Office with a view to the purchase of a portion of the premises, and it has been decided to put the premises, exclusive of the castle, up for sale by public auction subject to conditions as regards access to and preservation of the castle. It will therefore be seen that there is no danger that the castle itself will be used as a bacon factory, and every care will be taken that the castle shall not suffer. If a bacon factory should be established in Roscrea, any question of sanitation which might possibly arise in connection with it would be a matter for the local authorities to deal with.

Mr. Sampson Beamish's Estate.

MR. EDWARD BARRY (Cork County, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. Sampson Beamish, Kilmalorda, Timoleague, having entered into an agreement of sale with his tenants, has been unable to obtain the consent of the Estates Commissioners to grant him the benefit of the bonus in case a tenant named Buttimar was excluded from the area of sale; and, if so, will steps be taken to induce the Estates Commissioners to omit this farm, without prejudice to the interests of the selling landlord.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the Estates Commissioners that Mr. Beamish has lodged with them an originating application instituting proceedings for the sale of certain townlands in the County Cork. As Mr. Beamish owns other tenanted townlands in the immediate neighbourhood, which he does not at present propose to sell, because he has not come to terms with the tenants, the Commissioners, in the exercise of the discretion conferred on them by Section 98 (1) of the Irish Land Act, 1903, have written to his solicitors stating that they are unable to see their way to declare the lands at present proposed to be sold to be an estate for the purposes of the Act, to the exclusion of the lands which the tenants have not yet agreed to purchase.

Surgeon-General Roe's Estate.

MR. KENDAL O'BRIEN (Tipperary, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state how many acres of untenanted land are owned by Surgeon-General Roe in the parish of Bourney, Roscrea, County Tipperary, and also how many in the adjoining parish of Clonmore or Killavinoge; and will he recommend to the Estates Commissioners the desirability of approaching the landlord with a view to acquiring this untenanted land for distribution amongst the people.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners have received no application in respect of the estate mentioned, and they have no knowledge of the circumstances or extent of the estate. They will make inquiry into the matter if an application should be made to them.

Police Protection of Denis Connolly.

MR. KENDAL O'BRIEN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the need for continuing police protection to Denis Connolly, of Borrisnoe, parish of Bourney, County Tipperary, in view of the peaceable condition of this district; is this man constantly attended by two policemen; and will he state the circumstances under which protection was given to him in the first instance.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The police authorities inform me that it is the fact that this district is now in a peaceable condition, but that it is still considered necessary to give constant police protection in the case referred to. I understand that some local feeling still exists against Connolly, owing to proceedings in which he gave evidence some years ago.

Tipperary Police Barracks.

MR. KENDAL O'BRIEN: To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the distance which separates the three police barracks of Gurtderrybeg, Clonnakenny, and Timoney, in the barony of Ikerrin, Roscrea district, County Tipperary; whether he is aware that the two first of these are in one parish, and less than three miles apart; and can he state what reason exists for the continuance of Gurtderrybeg barrack, seeing that it is intermediate between the other two; and, furthermore, seeing that these barracks are situated in the midst of extensive grazing lands, is it as a protection to the people who take these lands on the eleven months' system, or otherwise, that this force of police is kept in such close proximity.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) I am informed by the police authorities that each of the three police stations named is distant at least four miles from the nearer of the other two stations. Two of these stations are situated in the same parish, but the districts attached to them extend into six other parishes. The extent of country to be policed from the three stations is nearly fifty square miles, and each of the stations is considered necessary. It is the fact that these stations are situated in a grazing district, but they were established before any difficulty in connection with the grazing system arose, and are not specially retained for the protection of grazing tenants.

Irish Sub-Commission—Mr Croasdaile.

MR. DELANY (Queen's County, Ossory): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Mr. Croasdaile, before being appointed Sub-Commissioner, failed to succeed as a farmer, and after repeatedly changing his system of farming for some years, ultimately let his land on the eleven months' system; and whether he can say when Mr. Croasdaile's term of appointment expires, and if it is proposed to continue his services as Sub-Commissioner.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Land Commission inform me that they have given Mr. Croasdaile an opportunity of replying to the suggestions made in the first part of this Question. Mr. Croasdaile states that it is not a fact that before being appointed an Assistant Commissioner he failed to succeed as a farmer; that the only change which he made in his system of farming resulted from an outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia, which prevented him from offering his cattle for sale; and that he did not let his lands for grazing until after he had been appointed an Assistant Commissioner. Mr. Croasdaile's present term of appointment will expire on the 31st instant. I cannot at present make any statement as to how many and which of the existing temporary Assistant Commissioners will be re-appointed.

Black Mountain, Galway.

Mr. DUFFY (Galway, S.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the application made to the Estates Commissioners by James Flynn and Patrick Mullin, of Lisheenvalley, for a division of the Black Mountain, now given over to Mrs. Lopdell, he will explain why the lands are let at 1s. an acre to Mrs. Lopdell, seeing that Flynn, Mullin, and others made an offer to the Commissioners for these lands, subject to an annuity of 4s. per acre, and on the understanding that they would build houses and reside thereon.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they received no applications from the persons named, or others, for the land which is being sold to Mrs. Lopdell. This land, as I have already explained, was unsuitable for the enlargement of small holdings.

Donegal Assize Grand Jury Panel.

Mr. O'DOHERTY (Donegal, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will explain why no Nationalists or Catholics were summoned on the grand jury for the County of Donegal for the last spring assizes; and whether he will state the respective percentage of Catholics and Protestants in that country; and will he take steps to have this state of affairs remedied.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) Grand juries are empanneled by high sheriffs under the provisions of the Grand Jury Acts. I am informed by the high sheriff of County Donegal that the grand jury at the recent assizes was empanneled in the usual way, and that one Catholic was summoned, but did not attend. According to the census of 1901, the percentage of Roman Catholics in the county was 77·73, and of Protestants, 21·84. The high sheriff, however, informs me that though Catholics generally are in a great majority in the county, thos who are qualified by Statute for the grand jury form a very small minority. It is not alleged that the provisions of the law have not been observed, and the Government have, therefore, no power to interfere in the matter.

Irish Education—Text Books.

Mr. BARRIE (Londonderry, N.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if in the forthcoming revision of the syllabus for Irish national schools the Board of National Education will avoid making any change in the arithmetical courses for the standards, as when change are made so frequently, owing to the losses involved, publishers decline to revise their text books, to the detriment of educational facilities.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Commissioners of National Education inform me that they have already revised their syllabuses for the school year beginning on 1st July next, and that very few changes have been made in the arithmetical courses. In any revisions they may make, the Commissioners are influenced solely by the educational needs of the pupils, and they would welcome a less dependence by teachers upon the use of text books in national schools as a desirable change.

Labourers (Ireland) Acts.

Mr. SHEEHAN (Cork County, Mid.): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland whether any advances have been made by the Estates Commissioners, or whether any applications for advances to trustees have been received by them, under Section 4 of the Land Act of 1903, for the purchase of any parcels of land for the purposes of the Labourers (Ireland) Acts; if so, will he give particulars of these advances or applications, and will he define the conditions under which advances are made.

(Answered by Mr. Bryce.) The Estates Commissioners inform me that they have received no application for an advance for the purpose mentioned.

Royal Hibernian Academy Report.

Mr. BUTCHER (Cambridge University): To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state when the Report about the Royal Hibernian Academy will be issued; and what is the cause of this prolonged delay in publication.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) I am informed that, owing to the calls upon the time of some of the members, the Committee has not yet drafted its Report, but I understand that further meetings will be held shortly.

Boys and Firearms.

Mr. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Croydon): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he can state approximately the number of men and boys, inhabitants of the United Kingdom, who are being, or have been, instructed in the use of firearms, including those trained in the Royal Navy, Royal Naval Reserve and Naval Volunteers, the Regular Army and Army Reserve, the Militia, Yeomanry, Volunteers, Cadet Corps, Rifle Clubs, and Royal Irish Constabulary; and whether he can give any estimate of the number of persons not contained in any of the above categories who have acquired the use of firearms without assistance from the State.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The right hon. Gentleman is doubtless aware than when he was at the War Office there were no statistics available to enable a reply to be given to such a Question. There has been no change in this respect since he left. Part of the Question also appertains to the Admiralty and the Irish Office.

Barracks on Foreign Stations.

Mr. BELLAIRS (Lynn Regis): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether, seeing that The Military Works Act, 1903, estimated that £500,000 would be realised by the sale of barracks, which was to be applied to works on various foreign stations sanctioned under the Act, he can state what proportion of the £500,000 has been realised; and whether, allowing for depreciation, it is believed that the entire sum will be obtained.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) Under present circumstances it is not likely that the credits will reach the anticipated sum. As yet they only amount to a very small sum.

Army Seven-year Enlistments.

Major SEELY (Liverpool, Abercromby): To ask the Secretary of State for War how many men were enlisted for seven years or over for service in the regular Army during the year ending June 1st, 1903; and how many of these men left the Army up to the present time, and for what reasons.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) During the period stated there were six enlistments for seven years and 2,088 for long service, twelve years. These latter are almost all boys. No information is readily available as to the number of these who have left the service, or of the reasons for their so doing.

Ex-Sergeants and their Uniform.

Mr. McCRAE (Edinburgh, E.): To ask the Secretary of State for War whether non-commissioned officers of the Line attaining the rank of sergeant will be allowed the privilege of retaining their rank and wearing uniform on retirement after ten years service, as at present accorded to sergeants serving their time engagement as instructors of volunteers.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) This Question has received very careful consideration; but it has not been found possible to make the concession suggested by my hon. friend.

Milk for the Army.

Mr. O'DOHERTY: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that condensed milk is supplied to the home forces as a substitute for new milk, and will he state in what quantities this is permitted; what quantity of new milk is allowed a soldier per day; are the contractors for new milk the direct producers of same, and what is the price paid; and are the married quarters supplied by the barrack contractor, or how.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) The supply of milk to soldiers' messes is made under regimental arrangements through the regimental institutes, the soldiers having a direct voice in the management of their own messes. I am not, therefore, cognisant of the details mentioned. The families of soldiers make their own arrangements for the supply of milk. No allowance of milk is made to a soldier except in certain cases for hospital use.

MR. O'DOHERTY: To ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the tender form for the supply of new milk to the home forces is so arranged, by having other commodities bracketed with it, as to prevent the farmer or dairyman from becoming the direct contractor; and will he say what medical and sanitary supervision is exercised over the milk supplied within barracks in order to prevent typhoid or other infectious diseases from being carried in.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) In the rules for the management of regimental institutes it is recommended that milk be purchased direct from the producer, and there is nothing in the specimen form to prevent direct supply. The examination of milk and the inspection of the animals and premises from which it comes by a sanitary officer, selected by the principal medical officer, are expressly provided for in the terms of contract.

Soldiers' and Sailors' False Characters.

SIR CHARLES DILKE: To ask the Secretary of State for War if he will explain the reasons which make it necessary to proceed by separate legislation in the matter of sailors' and soldiers' false characters, rather than by amendment of the powers, in respect of false statements in connection with the entry into the naval and military forces of the Crown, conferred by the Army Act.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Haldane.) This Bill is identical with the Bill which was introduced last session. It is intended to provide for the punishment of persons who cannot be dealt with by the Army Act, e.g., (1) a discharged seaman or soldier; (2) a man desirous of becoming a seaman or soldier; (3) a person who gives either of the above a false character or statement. I may add that the chief object of the Bill is to deal with the last class.

Highland Crofting Rentals.

MR. WEIR (Ross and Cromarty): To ask the Secretary for Scotland if he will state the number of persons in each of the Highland crofting counties whose rentals do not exceed £4.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) The facts desired are not at present at my disposition, but I am taking steps to ascertain the figures, and in due course a return will be presented to Parliament.

Petersport Pier Road.

MR. JOHN DEWAR (Inverness): To ask the Secretary for Scotland if he can state the reason for the delay in completing the road leading to the pier at Petersport, for which a grant has been promised by the Congested Districts Board.

(Answered by Mr. Sinclair.) The Congested Districts Board have given grants for £1,800, and for a further sum of £238, which was made on February 13th, 1905, on the distinct understanding that this is the final grant, and is given on the condition that the statutory road authority shall provide for all the remaining cost of completing the access road. The district clerk wrote on the 5th instant that his committee are surprised the Board has taken no step to resume the work. They were informed on the 8th instant that it is not for the Congested Districts Board but for the statutory road authority to construct the road. The grants given by the Board have been on the most liberal scale, and it rests with the road authority to complete the construction.

Royal Naval College, Osborne—Cadet Examination.

MR. BELLAIRS: To ask the Secretary to the Admiralty how many cadets have entered the Royal Naval College at Osborne, up to and including the examination in November, 1905, and how many of these cadets were the sons of persons in straitened circumstances for whom the fees were reduced.

(Answered by Mr. Edmund Robertson.) Of the 588 cadets who have entered the Royal Naval College at Osborne up to and including January, 1906, thirty-three were entered at the reduced rate of £40. The regulations limit the grant of this rate to the sons of naval and military officers and of civil officers under the Board of Admiralty.

Glanders Outbreak at Oxford.

MR. JOHN PHILIPPS (Pembroke): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture, whether his attention has been called to the outbreak of glanders among the Government Yeomanry remounts at Oxford, and can he say how many horses have been destroyed; whether any of these animals had been known to be in contact with horses brought from South Africa by the late Government; and, if not, how the outbreak of disease is accounted for.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) A serious outbreak of glanders has recently occurred at Wytham, in Berkshire, due to a horse which had been moved there from the Clarendon Hotel at Oxford. The horse was the property of the War Office and was used for Yeomanry purposes, but I am informed that it was never in contact with horses brought from South Africa, and there is no evidence whatever to show that is contracted the disease from other Army horses. Twelve horses have been slaughtered by the local authority, and we are making a thorough inquiry into the case in concert with the Army Veterinary Department. The measures already adopted have, I hope, prevented the further spread of the disease.

Northampton Butchers' Association—Swine Fever Order.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): To ask the hon. Member for South Somerset, as representing the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the Board has received and considered an application from the Northampton Town and County Master Butchers' Association, praying the Board, in view of the present restrictions on purchase of pigs for use in Northampton from other markets in Northamptonshire and adjoining counties, to so amend the Swine Fever Order as to grant a slaughtering licence available from these outside markets to the licensed slaughter-houses in Northampton; and whether the prayer of this petition will be granted by the Board.

(Answered by Sir Edward Strachey.) We have been in communication with the Northampton Butchers' Association on this matter. The Order requires no amendment to meet the difficulties referred to, which have arisen owing to a misapprehension of its effect. The matter has now been explained to the association and to the local authority, and I do not anticipate any further complaint.

Convictions for Drunkenness.

MR. SHACKLETON (Lancashire, Clitheroe): To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can state the number of persons proceeded against and the number convicted for being drunk last year, and the number of licence holders proceeded against and the number convicted for permitting drunkenness in the same period.

(Answered by Mr. Secretary Gladstone.) These particulars are given annually in Table XI. of the Criminal Judicial Statistics, but the statistics for the year 1905 cannot be ready for a considerable time to come. Figures on this subject for the year 1905 will be included in the volume of licensing statistics which is in course of preparation, and will, I hope, be ready for issue before long.

Irish Lighthouse Keepers.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): To ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Irish Lights Commissioners are contemplating any further reductions in the number of principal lighthouse keepers in their service; and, if so, is it intended to give any remuneration to the keepers whose duties and responsibilities will be increased by these reductions, and who will not have the same chance of promotion.

(Answered by Mr. Lloyd-George.) I am informed by the Commissioners of Irish Lights that they have not formulated any definite scheme for the reduction of the number of principal lightkeepers in their service, and that they cannot therefore give the information asked for.

Belfast Post Office—Promotions.

Mr. SLOAN (Belfast, S.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether, with reference to the three vacancies which were recently created through the promotion of the former holders in the ranks of acting or relieving postmasters on the staff of the Belfast post office, to which persons were appointed who hold the position of eighth, twenty-third, and thirtieth on the local seniority list of the telegraph branch of that office, he will state the respective length of service of each, the mode of selection adopted, and the particular qualification that they possessed which led to their preferment, to the exclusion of their seniors, upon that list; will he also state the average length of service of the first seven on the list; and whether, seeing that a general knowledge of postal as well as telegraph duties is essential to the due performance of the duties of an acting postmaster, he will say where and when did the appointees, in this instance, acquire such knowledge, particularly in respect of the proper treatment of the various accounts of head post offices.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The respective services of the three sorting clerks and telegraphists at Belfast who were recently selected for the duty of taking charge of vacant offices are, Number eight, twenty years and eight months; Number twenty-three, sixteen years and ten months; and Number thirty, fifteen years and ten months. The average length of service of the seven senior men is twenty-nine and a half years. The three officers were selected, because, taking into account the general qualifications of all the eligible officers, they were considered to be the most suitable for the duty.

Appointment to Provincial Postmasterships.

Mr. SHEEHY (Meath, S.): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he can state the number of provincial postmasters appointed during the past ten years after announcement of vacancy in Post Office Circular, and without announcement of vacancy in Post Office Circular, together with the rank from which each promoted officer was drawn, the scale of pay of that rank, and the salary he received on promotion.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) I am afraid I cannot give the hon. Member the information he desires, for considerable labour would be required to compile such a Return.

Irish Rural Postmen.

Captain DONELAN : To ask the Postmaster-General whether he will consider the desirability of extending the concessions recently granted to rural postmen in Great Britain to rural postmen in Ireland.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) The general concessions granted under the Stanley revision to rural postmen apply to those in Ireland as well as to those elsewhere in the United Kingdom. The rates of pay vary according to the work which has to be performed and the cost of living.

Mr. NANNETTI : To ask the Postmaster-General if it is intended in the new scale to include Irish rural postmen, who are at present on the scale 15s. by 1s. to 18s., in the new scale 16s. by 1s. to 20s., or are they, the Irish rural postmen, to be treated differently from the men employed in similar work in England, Scotland, and Wales.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) A certain number of rural postmen in Ireland are at present on the scale 15s. by 1s. to 18s., to which the hon. Member refers. The question of their pay is one that will, no doubt, come before the Committee on Post Office Servants.

London Postal Superintending Staff.

MR. NANNETTI (Dublin, College Green): To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that there does not exist a class of second-class assistant superintendents in the London postal service, although such a class exists for supervising purposes in the central telegraph office and in the large provincial offices; whether any memorial upon this question has been received from the London staff; and whether he contemplates taking any steps to place the London postal superintending staff upon the same footing as the provincial staffs and the London telegraph staff.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) A memorial on the subject has been received from the London staff and the question has been under consideration, but I do not think I should be justified in settling the matter, pending the Report of the Select Committee on Post Office Servants.

Ballinagh Postal Arrangements.

MR. VINCENT KENNEDY: To ask the Postmaster-General whether he is aware that there is no postal delivery in the rural district of Ballinagh, county Cavan, attaching to Carrigan post office, on Tuesdays and Thursdays, and also that in some cases the country people have to come two miles to post their letters; and whether, seeing that in the adjoining districts there is a daily delivery, he will recommend the erection of a pillar box, and generally improve postal facilities in the district.

(Answered by Mr. Sydney Buxton.) As this Question has not been under consideration since 1903, I have called for a fresh Report on the subject. On its receipt I will communicate with the hon. Member.

Civil Service Pensions.

MR. CROOKS (Woolwich): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that women typists, Customs boatmen, clerks taken over in 1889 from the Submarine Telegraph Company, and certain other classes of civil servants, are allowed, under Clause 3 of The Superannuation Act, 1887, to count towards pension the whole of their temporary service which preceded established service, and that in the case of retirement of abstractors of the senior grade a similar concession has in every instance been withheld, only half of their temporary service being allowed to count towards pension, he will make arrangements whereby the members of the abstractor class shall in future be accorded equal treatment in the matter of superannuation with that of other grades whose unestablished service is allowed to count in full.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) In exercising the discretion entrusted to the Treasury by Section 3 of The Superannuation Act, 1887, with respect to the reckoning of temporary service for pension, regard is had to the character and conditions of the service rendered. Each case or class of cases must therefore be considered on its merits. The temporary service of the abstractors referred to in the Question was rendered in the capacity of copyists, and the regulations governing their employment expressly stated that no service in this capacity, however prolonged, would confer any claim to superannuation. It was found, however, at the time when these temporary copyists were first promoted to be abstractors that a portion of their work had in many cases been above the level of what was ordinarily required of copyists; and it was accordingly decided, as part of the terms on which they were placed on the establishment, that half of their service as copyists should be allowed to reckon for pension. I see no reason for extending this concession.

Second Division Clerks.

MR. TIMOTHY DAVIES (Fulham): To ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether there are any recent instances in which the Treasury have withheld their sanction to the recommendations from responsible heads of departments for the promotion, on the ground of special fitness and merit, of certain of their senior assistant clerks (abstractor class) to the Second Division; and, if so, whether he can state the number of such cases; and whether, having regard to the fact that the senior assistant clerks are men of long service and experience to their several departments, and that they are at present penalised in the matter of superannuation, to the extent of half their early temporary service being disallowed towards pension, he will see that Treasury sanction to their promotion, when specially recommended by their responsible chiefs, shall not be refused to them.

(Answered by Mr. McKenna.) I can only trace, since the beginning of 1904, one case (affecting two assistant clerks) in which the recommendation of the head of the department has not been approved by the Treasury. It would not be possible to give a general pledge that all such recommendations shall be approved, as the Treasury has necessarily to exercise a discretion in dealing with the recommendations of heads of departments under Clause 15 of the Order in Council of 29th November, 1898.

Cloudesley Charity Estate.

SIR JOHN DICKSON-POYNDER (Wiltshire, Chippenham): To ask the President of the Board of Education whether the Board, in dealing with the application of the London County Council for a Provisional Order to take a part of the Cloudesley Charity Estate for a school for mentally-afflicted children, are aware that the charity is the one large charity in Islington, that upon its grants other charities of Islington, including the Great Northern Hospital and the poorer churches, are largely dependent, and that the Order, if granted, would result in a deterioration in the value of the charity property, which could not be made good by money compensation; and whether he will consider the advisability of withholding his assent from this proposal.

(Answered by Mr. Birrell.) I am aware of the allegations referred to in the Question, and I have reason to hope that they may be exaggerated. But whether this is so or not, the Board, in considering whether a Provisional Order should be issued for the compulsory purchase of a site, have always held that any question as to the depreciation in value of surrounding property was for the consideration of Parliament when the Provisional Order Confirmation Bill is before it, and not for the Board.
